AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

In the sitting of the Lower House of the Austrian Reichsrath on the 15th inst., the Prague University Bill was read the third time and passed. The Bill relative to a Austro-Hungarian customs tariff was introduced, accompanied by a letter from the Minister of Commerce.

The Hungarian Diet has been discussing a petition calling for the repeal of the Act for emancipating the Jews. In referring to the subject, M. Tisza said some of the speakers seemed to sigh for the ukases of the Czar, and protested against repealing laws which had put an end to an injustice.

RUSSIA.

An official disclaimer of General Skobelev's speech in Paris has been published.

A remarkable letter has been addressed to the Czar by the Metropolitan of Moscow, in which, "in terms of loyal frankness," his Majesty is urged to quit his retirement, and to live less secluded from his subjects. His present retirement is denounced as "poltroonery," leading to disunion between the Emperor and his people. The Emperor Alexander asked the Procurator of the Holy Synod whether he could not dismiss the outspoken Archbishop, but was told that he could only do so with the consent of a special sitting of the Synod.

The trial of Trigoni, Suchanow, and their accomplices began on Tuesday before the District Court of St. Petersburg.

TURKEY.

Very cordial expressions of good-will were exchanged between Prince Radziwill and the Sultan on the occasion of conferring, last Saturday, the German Order of the Black Eagle on his Majesty. The Sultan subsequently conferred decorations on the various members of the German Mission. A gala dinner followed, presided over by the Sultan.

An Identical Note was on Tuesday handed to the Minister for Foreign Affairs, in which the English and French Governments, in spite of the Porte's protests, maintain their right of addressing the recent Joint Note directly to the Khedive.

EGYPT.

It is announced from Cairo that the Ministry have resolved on the abolition of slavery in Egypt, and are taking measures for giving effect to this resolution.

AMERICA.

The Senate has passed the bill making polygamous marriages punishable by fine and imprisonment, and depriving those who contract them of all rights of citizenship. The House has passed the Apportionment Bill, making the new House to consist of 325 members. The Committee of the House on Territories has agreed to report the bill admitting the territory of Dakota as one of the States of the Union.

The House of Representatives has passed a bill for the repayment to Japan of the unexpended balance of the American share of the Japanese indemnity for damage done to foreign shipping about eighteen years ago.

The Asylum for Insane at Flatbush, New York, has been burned. The 800 inmates were excited almost beyond control, and one was fatally frightened. Nearly twenty escaped.

Almost all the business part of Haverhill, in Massachusetts, has been destroyed by fire. It has a population of 20,000, and its chief business is shoemaking. More than 300 firms and business men are burnt out, and 2500 persons are thrown out of employment.

Great disasters have been caused in the Mississippi Valley by the continued overflow of the river. The prospects of the next cotton crop are seriously endangered.

CANADA.

Notice has been given in the Dominion House of Commons of several motions in favour of better provision being made for the extradition of criminals.

The estimated expenditure of the province of Ontario for the present year amounts to 2,330,000 dols.

The New Brunswick Legislature was opened on the 16th inst. by the Lieutenant-Governor, who, in his speech, said that the affairs of the province were in a very favourable position. He announced that the Government proposed starting a cattle-breeding farm for the improvement of the stock.

The estimates of the Dominion Treasury for the fiscal year 1882-3 amount to 53,000,000 dols.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

Confusion is becoming worse confounded in the Parliamentary arena. With unfeigned regret must all who value our Constitution regard the differences that now and again arise between the majority of Peers and the majority of the Commons. Equally to be deplored are the repeated conflicts between the Lower House and Mr. Bradlaugh, whose resolute and obstinate attitude at the beginning of the week bore a sufficient resemblance to the full stop of the elephant "Jumbo" at the Zoological Gardens to have its ludicrous side. Unlike "Jumbo," however, Mr. Bradlaugh could not maintain his firm stand against the powers that be, as will be seen in the record of Wednesday's proceedings.

To the Earl of Donoughmore belongs the credit of initiating the movement that occasioned the imminent collision of opinion between the two Houses. His Lordship, one of the youngest and free-and-easiest of peers, may be said to have some sympathy with one member of the Fourth Party in the Commons, inasmuch as Sir H. Drummond Wolff had Lord Donoughmore for his official companion when dispatched by the late Lord Beaconsfield to the East as the British Commissioner for taking part in the settlement of the Bulgarian frontier. Clearly, some of the guerrilla spirit which prompts one or the other of the lively Fourth Party to assume the functions of Leader of the Opposition in the House below appeared to animate the Earl of Donoughmore yesterday week, when he strove to show cause why their Lordships should appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the working of the Irish Land Act. Albeit the noble Earl excited Opposition cheering by reference to cases in which 23 per cent reduction of rent had been ordered by the Land Commissioners, the Marquis of Salisbury was not to be stimulated into rising.

Appropriately enough, Lord Carlisle, as a previous Chief Secretary for Ireland, and Earl Spencer as a former Lord Lieutenant, and a popular Viceroy, too, were the first Ministers to join issue with Lord Donoughmore. Both the Lord Privy Seal and the Lord President of the Council earnestly deprecated the motion for inquiry into an Act that had only been in operation four months; defended the general nature of the decisions of the Commissioners and Sub-Commissioners; and maintained that the utmost care had been taken by Mr. Forster in the appointment of the latter officers of the Court. But the tide was strong against the Government. The Marquis of Lansdowne and the Earl of Dunraven from the Ministerial side, the Marquis of Waterford, and other noble Lords deprecated the action of the Assistant Commissioners, and condemned their wholesale reduction of rents. Lord Emily mildly intervened with the remark that it was futile to expect all the beneficial results of the Land Act to be visible at once. Yet Earl Cairns was not to be dissuaded from giving Lord Donoughmore's motion his powerful support in a speech characteristically clear and incisive. Affirming that Parliament never intended that the thirty-six Sub-Commissioners should be empowered to alienate property—and settle the rent of a farm by a hasty visit, chiefly taken up with sticking a staff into the soil, like a cheese-taster, smelling it, and laconically summing up the matter in the words, "Fifteen shillings an acre!"—Earl Cairns insisted on the injustice done to the landlords in the average reduction of rent to between 25 and 30 per cent. It was in vain the Lord Chancellor rose and pointed out the manifest unfairness of impeaching the justice of the Commissioners, and the inexpediency of bringing them here virtually on their trial; dwelt on the fact that the rent decisions varied from 4 per cent above Griffith's valuation in Ulster to 20 per cent above that valuation in Munster; and claimed that the Act had effected a real, substantial, and progressive improvement of affairs in Ireland. Towards one o'clock on Saturday morning their Lordships divided, and agreed to the motion for the Select Committee by a majority of 43-96 against 53 votes.

Earl Granville lost no time in letting the House of Lords know that the Government would take no part in the proceedings of the Committee on the Irish Land Act—a course which the Marquis of Salisbury pronounced "a grave one" and "entirely without precedent." Earl Cairns, with the approval of the Lord Chancellor, reintroduced his Settled Land Bill, which was read the first time, as well as his Conveyancing Amendment Bill. A Channel Tunnel inquiry of Lord Stratheden and Campbell elicited from the Foreign Secretary the assurance (which Earl Granville was called upon to repeat on Tuesday) that the Government were considering the matter in all its bearings. So that it is probably an anxious time with the promoters of the rival Tunnel bills, especially as H.R.H. the Duke of Cambridge and Sir Garnet Wolseley have pronounced against the projected Tunnel. Lord Brougham, being interested in one of these projects, was not undeserving of the rebuke the Marquis of Bath neatly bestowed upon his complacent Lordship on Tuesday for joining in the Tunnel conversation.

In the arena of the Commons the stormy winds of faction do blow with increasing zest. It was not until the expiration of the ninth night of the Hibernian debate on the Address—not till the small hours of Saturday morning last, in point of fact—that the Marquis of Hartington had the satisfaction of seeing the reply to the Queen's Speech agreed to by a majority of 115-129 against 14 votes. By greater precision of speech, and a firmer hold of the tiller in Mr. Gladstone's absence, it will be admitted that the noble Marquis is well qualifying himself to discharge the onerous duties of Leadership that may ere long fall wholly to his lot.

Now for Monday. Let Sir William Harcourt receive due praise for causing the heartiest general outburst of laughter that has enlivened the House this Session. Apropos of a question regarding the introduction into this country of an anti-Jewish journal, named Christian and Jew, the Home Secretary, with a certain amount of dry, ponderous, elephantine humour summarised a letter he had received from some correspondent who justified a crusade against the Jews on the score that they had established cigar-shops all over London and combined "to make Baron Henry de Worms Prime Minister of Great Britain." The House rang with laughter at this allusion to the hon. member for Greenwich, who bore his blushing honours quite good-humouredly. Mr. Gladstone speedily restored the serious tone by reasonably announcing that next Monday, as a Ministerial reply to the Lords' decision, he would move, "That Parliamentary inquiry at the present time into the working of the Irish Land Act tends to defeat the operation of that Act, and must be injurious to good government in Ireland. It would be to initiate the prolixity of the House itself to state at length how forthwith Mr. Gorst, Lord Randolph Churchill, Mr. Newdegate, Mr. Cowen, Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir R. Cross, Mr. W. H. Smith, and Lord John Manners volubly protested against the Ministerial plan of conducting business. Suffice it to say that the answers of Mr. Gladstone and the Marquis of Hartington prevailed; that no division was taken on the motion for adjournment; and that the Prime Minister was enabled in the lull to make a good start in his speech explanatory of the new rules of procedure proposed by the Government. It will be observed that a slight alteration was made in the first, the closure, resolution:—

That when it shall appear to Mr. Speaker, or to the Chairman of a Committee of the whole House, during any debate, to be the evident sense of the House, or of the Committee, that the question be now put, he may so inform the House; and if a motion be made "That the question be now put," Mr. Speaker, or the Chairman, shall forthwith put such question; and, if the same be decided in the affirmative, the question under discussion shall be put forthwith: provided that the question shall not be decided in the affirmative, if a division be taken, unless it shall appear to have been supported by more than 200 members, or unless it shall appear to have been opposed by less than forty members and supported by more than 100.

Of personal interest though the Premier's individual recollections were, the main points of his long argument were that the late Lord Eversley was in favour of the closure; that the power of closing a debate obtained in France, Belgium, Italy, Germany, Austria, Hungary, Denmark, Switzerland, Holland, the United States, and in several of our Colonies; and that the two days' sitting in the Parliament of 1874, when Mr. Parnell and his associates kept up their opposition for upwards of twenty-six hours, and the prolonged sitting of last year, when upwards of forty consecutive hours were spent in a protracted wrangle had induced the Speaker himself (a word here of compliment to Sir Henry Brand for his patience) to declare that it was for the House to place greater power of control in his hands. Mr. Gladstone closed with a quietly yet impressively delivered appeal, not without a touch of solemnity when he alluded to his life as having been in the past, and earnestly adjured the House to dispassionately and without prejudice consider how best the rules might be reformed so as not to restrict legitimate freedom of speech on the one hand, and on the other hand to maintain their reputation as the first Legislative Assembly in the world. All Party differences were sunk, and a general tribute of respect and admiration came from both sides of the House as Mr. Gladstone resumed his seat.

As Leader of the Opposition, Sir Stafford Northcote had the disadvantage of immediately following the Premier, but yet applied himself courageously to the task of showing the inadvisability of agreeing to the closure. He inclined to the opinion that the Speaker's regulations of last Session would best meet the difficulties. Mr. Marriott's amendment, adverse to empowering a majority to close a debate, was introduced with a spice of personality, which Mr. Goschen animadverted on in a characteristically able speech, capped, however, by Mr. E. Stanhope's smart application of the following couplet to the Prime Minister:—

Prompt to supply what'er his country lacks,
Skillful to gag, and knowing how to tax.

Mr. Bradlaugh's invasion of the House, now of periodical occurrence, has proved a further block to business. The unorthodox member for Northampton on Tuesday took the House by surprise in a novel manner. Mr. Labouchere's motion that, as a logical sequence to the resolutions estopping his colleague from taking the oath, a new writ should be issued for Northampton, was negatived by 307 against 18 votes. Thereupon the House were taken aback by Mr. Bradlaugh walking to the table, taking a Testament from his pocket, and repeating the oath of allegiance, subscribing his name on a Parliamentary form, and leaving the paper with Sir Erskine May. Protesting he took each step in accordance with law, Mr. Bradlaugh obeyed the Speaker's request to retire beyond the bar, but did not finally resume his place under the gallery till he had momentarily occupied a seat on one of the Radical benches below the gangway. Acting on the advice of the Attorney-General in preference to the headstrong counsel of the leader of the Fourth Party, the House did not take further action in the matter till Wednesday.

The whole of Ash Wednesday was monopolised by this precious Bradlaugh question. Characterising Mr. Bradlaugh's proceedings of Tuesday as "painful and scandalous in the highest degree," Mr. Gladstone yet left it to Sir Stafford Northcote to move that Captain Gosset should take steps to prevent the heterodox member from coming into "the precincts of the House." But, upon the Speaker subsequently declining to hear the troublesome member at the bar, and upon Bradlaugh's consequent taking a seat in the body of the Mr. House, the Leader of the Opposition substituted this resolution:—

That Charles Bradlaugh, Esq., one of the members for Northampton having disobeyed the orders of this House, and having, in contempt of its authority of this House, irregularly and contumaciously attempted to subscribe to the oath required by law, be expelled this House.

Mr. Bradlaugh, however, voted in the division, which excluded him by 291 against 81 votes; and afterwards left the House. The unseemly scene ended with the issue of a new writ for Northampton, on the motion of Sir Stafford Northcote.

THE CHANNEL TUNNEL.

A party of about sixty gentlemen, chiefly representatives of the press, visited the Channel Tunnel boring at Dover on Tuesday, by invitation of Sir Edward Watkin. The tunnel, which commences at the bottom of a shaft 160 ft. deep, has been carried a distance of 1030 yards, 500 of which are under the sea; and the length of the boring is increasing at the rate of about 1000 yards a week. The conditions of the work are described as most satisfactory. The rock, though easy to work, is impervious to water. The boring is being carried on simultaneously by the French and English companies from each side of the strait, and a junction is expected to be made precisely in mid-Channel. The rock is excavated by a machine worked by compressed air, and the subway, which is perfectly ventilated, is illuminated by the electric light. At the close of the inspection, the visitors were entertained at luncheon at the Lord Warden Hotel. Mr. Myles Fenton, manager of the South-Eastern Railway, presided; and among the speakers were Colonel Beaumont, Mr. Brady, the company's engineer, and Mr. Shaw, the secretary.

On Tuesday night the annual festival of the Royal Masonic Benevolent Institution was held at Freemasons' Hall, under the presidency of Colonel J. A. Lloyd Phillips, the Provincial Grand Master for the Western Division of South Wales, who was supported by 250 stewards and a large number of other Brethren. The sum given annually in annuities amounts to nearly £12,000, of which the greater portion is raised by the stewards to be presented at the annual festival. The subscriptions amounted to £12,347, made up with subscriptions from the provinces, including the metropolitan counties of Middlesex, Surrey, Essex and Kent, while the Metropolis itself sent £6884.

In London 2674 births and 2188 deaths were registered last week. Allowing for increase of population, the births were 73 below, whereas the deaths exceeded by 337 the average numbers in the corresponding week of the last ten years. The deaths included 17 from smallpox, 46 from measles, 24 from scarlet fever, 6 from diphtheria, 205 from whooping-cough, one from typhus fever, 14 from enteric fever, 3 from ill-defined forms of continued fever, 11 from diarrhoea and dysentery, and not one from simple cholera. The deaths referred to diseases of the respiratory organs, which had been equal to 543, 647, and 994 in the three preceding weeks, declined again last week to 769, but exceeded by 237 the corrected weekly average; 522 were attributed to bronchitis, and 167 to pneumonia.

The Extra Supplement.

A COLLIERY DISASTER.

The subject of our Engraving presented as the Extra Supplement to this publication is a scene that has often been witnessed in the courageous efforts which are made to enter a colliery pit, after the deadly explosion of "fire-damp" or inflammable gas, and to succour those who may be surviving in the dark passages far underground. Two fatal disasters of this character, the first, in South Wales, causing the instant death of six men and injuring many others, the second, on Thursday last week, at the Trindon Grange Colliery, between Durham and West Hartlepool, with a loss of seventy lives, have recently been described in the daily newspapers. In the latter instance, a hundred men or more were at the time working underground in the Harvey seam, at the moment of the explosion. A tremendously loud report and an outburst of flame from the shaft soon brought the officials to the mouth of the pit, when it was found that the cage had jammed thirty yards from the bottom of the shaft. Half an hour was lost in rigging a "kibble" to enable a rescue party to descend, and by this time the night-shift men, the families of those who were below, and crowds from the surrounding collieries had arrived. The explorers reached the Harvey seam by the low main shaft, and effected a communication through the staple with the high main. By this means, first two men, then three, and nine others, were brought to the bank, all alive, but suffering more or less seriously from after-damp, or suffocating carbonic acid gas. A medical gentleman was on the spot, and under his superintendence the poor fellows were removed to their homes. They appear to be in a fair way towards recovery. After this the work of rescuing the sufferers proceeded only slowly, owing to the debris encountered by the exploring party. The after-damp was driven by the force of the explosion into the Kelloc workings of the East Hetton Colliery, two miles distant, through some old communications, and the result was the suffocation of an underviewer and three other men. The work of exploration was continued during the night, but, owing to the heavy falls which are continually met with, the progress was but slow until a clearance could be effected.

THE SAILOR PRINCES AT HONG-KONG.

The visit of their Royal Highnesses, Prince Albert Victor of Wales, and Prince George of Wales, midshipmen of H.M.S. Bacchante, to Hong-Kong, which has already been mentioned, was the occasion for a grand display of public entertainments. Chinese taste and skill were employed by the native community, on the first day, Dec. 22, which happened to coincide with the festival held every year to solemnize the winter solstice; and the different Chinese trades' guilds, but more especially the Kwan Yin Kok, or Fishmongers, showed great spirit in their costly and elaborate preparations. We are indebted again to our esteemed naval correspondent with the British Flying Squadron, Lieutenant Percy M. Scott, of H.M.S. Inconstant, for sketches of the procession and the illuminations at Hong-Kong. The principal part of the spectacle, brought forward by the Kwan Yin Kok, was a huge moving Dragon, which had a total length of 300 ft., consisting of a head, seventy joints, and an immense tail; in its body each section, or joint, was made on a light bamboo frame, covered with silk, and painted with highly-coloured scales, and having a curtain of silk, at the sides, hanging down to conceal the man who carried this frame on a stick; while along the top was stretched a rod carrying the candles. These sections formed the monster's body. In order to make it perfectly flexible, the joints were connected by silk; and, on arriving at the Grand Stand, the Dragon coiled itself up, in a way that showed how beautifully it was made, and how well trained the carriers were. But its progress through the streets was not allowed to be a quiet and peaceable one, for in front of the head danced a man baiting it with a red ball on the end of a stick; this caused the Dragon to dart his head about, from one side to the other; and the whole body wriggled vehemently throughout its entire length. Some figure of a dragon, to frighten away evil spirits, is always introduced by the Chinese into ceremonial pageants. The streets and windows, or rather verandahs, were densely crowded, and the entire length of the street was profusely and brilliantly illuminated. The men who formed the procession were dressed some in white and some in yellow, with patches of red and gold tinsel. There was a beating of the big drum, and the shrill sound of fifes, making a stupendous din, which served to keep up the excitement of the crowd of spectators.

Mr. W. H. Macnamara, barrister-at-law, of the Oxford Circuit, has been appointed Registrar to the Railway Commissioners, in the room of Mr. J. H. Balfour Browne.

Dr. Thomas King Chambers, M.D., Christ Church, Oxon, F.R.C.P., has been elected the representative of the University of Oxford in the General Council of Medical Registration in the United Kingdom, in the place of the late Professor Rolleston.

Mr. Forster on Monday arrived in Dublin, where it is expected that he will stay during the present week. His arrival in Ireland, being unexpected, gave rise to considerable comment in Dublin city.

The Coroner's inquest into the cause of the death of the little girl Moore at Yalding was concluded on Monday. Some further evidence of a subsidiary nature was given, and the jury, after a short deliberation, returned a verdict of wilful murder against Esther Pay.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer acknowledges the receipt of the two halves of a £1000 note for income tax, from "S. S. J.," of the first half of a Bank-of-England note for £100 from E. F., and of the first halves of two £5 notes sent anonymously.

The nomination for Meath took place at Trim on Wednesday. The candidates nominated were Mr. Patrick Egan, 99, Avenue de Villiers, Paris, and Mr. Michael Davitt, Portland Prison. Mr. Egan's name was subsequently withdrawn. There being no other candidate nominated, the High Sheriff declared Davitt duly elected.

The proposal to preserve Smeaton's Eddystone Lighthouse from being cast into the sea has been revived with much greater prospects of success. At a meeting held on Monday letters were read which led to the belief that the Trinity Brethren would modify their demands for the Eddystone as old material, and for bringing it ashore in a condition fit for rebuilding. Two munificent offers were made at the meeting. Mr. Pethick, the builder of the Plymouth Guildhall, offered to re-erect the whole edifice at his own expense on the Hoe; and Mr. Alderman Derry undertook to convey the material from the landing-stage to the site. The other expense remaining would be the sum required for the material, the expense of taking it down, and the cost of conveying it ashore. Towards this nearly £400 was promised in the room. A deputation was appointed to wait upon the Board of Trade.

THE "ZOO" ELEPHANT WHO WILL NOT GO TO AMERICA.

"No, my dear friend!" says Tom Pinch to Martin Chuzzlewit. "Don't be so dreadfully regardless of yourself. Don't go to America!" Somebody must have been saying this to Jumbo, and he answers, "No, I won't." "All the King's horses and all the King's men," at least those of the Zoological Society, cannot make him go. He has the advantage of weighing six tons, which is a great help to a firm will, in the policy of masterly inactivity. And he feels himself pretty well off where he is, in the Regent's Park Gardens. He knows as much of the world as he cares to see. Born in Africa, he is a Londoner by youthful education and friendly associations. He has grown, both in reason and in stature, under the care of kind Mr. Bartlett, the Superintendent. Seventeen years ago, when he arrived from Paris, he was little above four feet high; now he stands upwards of eleven feet. He is the tallest of the African elephants in captivity, and nearly two feet taller than any on view in the United States of America, where tall things are so much admired. It therefore entered into the mind of Mr. Phineas T. Barnum, the famous American showman, to buy Jumbo, and the Zoological Society of London have sold Jumbo for £2000. Mr. Barnum has been the possessor of twenty elephants; he imported thirteen at once from Ceylon, direct to New York, of which eleven are still living. He has sent hither Mr. William Newman, familiarly called "Elephant Bill," to fetch the big African, all risks of transport being taken by Mr. Barnum. A passage was engaged for Jumbo on board the steam-ship Persian Monarch, in the docks at Millwall; but Jumbo's consent to emigrate had not been asked. The appointed hour for his departure from the Gardens came last Saturday afternoon. Our Illustrations, with the aid of some descriptive particulars borrowed from a report in the Daily Telegraph, show the arrangements made for this purpose, and the failure to effect his removal. Just outside the elephant-house, an immense box, like a packing-case made of thick planks, clamped and screwed on a strong framework of beams, was mounted on a low trolley. This was in a sunken spot of ground, so that the floor of the box should not be much above the level of the earth, from which Jumbo was to be marched along a gently sloping platform. To facilitate the draught of the heavily-laden trolley out of the deep ground, broad, smooth iron grooves had been laid down, along the track on which the thick, squat wheels were to travel. Openings in the sides and ends of the box would allow the attendants on Jumbo to gain access to the moving cell in which he was to make a trying voyage. But Jumbo did not fancy the vehicle prepared for him. It was in charge of the persons who had been sent from the United States, with the help of Scott, the keeper of elephants at the Zoological Society's Gardens, in whom of all the men about the place Jumbo reposed great confidence. Mr. Bartlett and his staff had entirely relinquished all command or responsibility concerning Jumbo. Something like the late Mr. Rarey's method of convincing a horse that he is powerless to act against his master's will was pursued towards this elephant. Using one of the strong chains as a strap, the American, with the assistance of Scott, fastened it round the leg, just under the joint that tallies with the knee of most quadrupeds, though this, in the elephant, is no higher above the fore-foot than the wrist-joint in a human being is above the hand. In point of fact, the chain may be said to have encircled the upper part of the foot. Jumbo submitted quietly enough to the operation, and even surveyed the motions of his new acquaintance with some appearance of curiosity. When, however, Scott had wound the other end of the chain round one of the stout, post-like rails of the barrier in front of Jumbo's compartment, so that the beast found himself unable to move except within a narrow space, he was evidently disconcerted. Still, he allowed a second chain to be girded round his other foot; and, with rather more allowance of play for the limb, by a lengthening of the iron cable, he presently felt that both legs were captive. This troubled him in no small degree; and he set about trying to snap the chain by powerful jerks, now and then feeling the coil round the bars with his sensitive proboscis, and lifting the chain to let it fall heavily on the stones. He was now much dejected, and showed for the first time unmistakable signs of fear. A much longer and equally massive chain was thrown over his back and fastened beneath his enormous body. Then a similar chain was placed round his forehead, just above the broad base of his trunk, where the stumps of tusks that have been fretfully rubbed and worn away project outwardly. A connecting chain, which passed between his fore-legs, formed a sort of martingale; and as soon as Jumbo was conscious of its restraining effect he gave passionate vent to his alarm and anger. His loud trumpetings and fierce assaults upon his iron bonds told a tale of something wrong to the elephants right and left of him. Solitary prisoners as they were, each in separate confinement, they tried desperately to get a sight at what was happening close to them, and joined chorus with poor Jumbo in bellows of dismay. The female elephant Alice, Jumbo's "little wife," as she is called, was most painfully agitated, and cried piteously in the stall next her lord's. But no rescue was brought, and Jumbo roared the louder when he heard the sympathetic moans of his wife and friends. By degrees the noise subsided, and Jumbo, tranquillised by exhaustion, became comparatively calm. Scott, taking his seat on the edge of the stone tank, and facing the now pacified animal, offered him biscuits, which poor Jumbo took with his pliant trunk, and conveyed slowly, one by one, to his cavern of a mouth, eyeing his friend the keeper reproachfully as, from time to time, he shook and clanked the heavy fetters. Not till six o'clock was it judged prudent to loosen these chains and to lead Jumbo to his box upon wheels. He walked quietly enough to the entrance, only trying with a cautious touch of his foot the firm wooden approach. But, having reached the opening, he halted, and could not be induced to move a step further. After several trials, the attendants gave up the business as impracticable, for the Saturday night.

On Sunday morning, at an early hour, Jumbo was again led out, with the intention of making him walk to the Docks at Millwall, instead of being carried. He was still in chains, and seemed quiet enough as he marched towards the wooden gate opposite the parrot-house. Before emerging on the road, Jumbo tried the ground, which differed in appearance from the accustomed gravel path inside the grounds; and not being satisfied as to its security, he refused to proceed. Efforts were made to drive him out, and the animal showed much distress; he mourned sadly, and appealed to his keeper, embracing the man with his trunk, and actually kneeling before him. Jumbo's cries were soon heard in the elephant-house, where his female consort was again seized with alarm and grief, so that every note of sorrow from the kneeling elephant in the road had its response within the gardens. At the sound of Alice's increasing lamentations, Jumbo became almost frantic, and flung himself down on his side. It was at length resolved to give up the attempt for that day. On Sunday afternoon, when the gardens were opened, as usual, to Fellows of the Zoological Society with their friends, and to others having private tickets given them by the Fellows, Jumbo was brought out, as he always is on public days, and behaved with his characteristic gentleness. He has since been a greater favourite than ever with all classes of visitors to the gardens, taking food out of their hands, and carrying loads of children on his back; but, during some part of the day, or rather at night, the chains have been put upon him, while confined in his stall, by order of "Elephant Bill," with a view to accustom him to their weight and noise. The box or cage upon wheels has undergone some modifications in detail, and will be narrowed, so as to afford support on each flank to the huge beast, if he be indeed doomed to exile from the country which has been so long his home. This box will now be daily placed in front of his stable door, the low wheels being sunk in the ground, and both ends of the box being left open, so that, passing out through it daily, he may become accustomed to its appearance. An attempt will be made, in a fortnight, to ship him by the next steamer of the "Monarch" Line; one of this line being chosen because they have very long and wide hatchways, and a great height between decks.

We present an illustration of the scene at the Zoological Society's Gardens, which is above described; and a few sketches of Jumbo in his youth, especially of the manner in which he once broke his tusks by endeavouring to force open a door, and of the effective, but somewhat bold and adventurous, surgical operation that Mr. Bartlett, the able Superintendent of the Gardens, then performed for the removal of an abscess in the jaws. Mr. Bartlett took the precaution, as shown in our sketch, to use an instrument affixed to the end of a rod or long handle; but he managed this with such careful aim and skill of hand, that it was quickly done, costing but little pain; and the young elephant was immediately relieved of the suffering caused by the inflammation. A second operation of the same kind was found needful, at the other side of the jaws; and the intelligent beast this time willingly submitted to Mr. Bartlett's repetition of similar treatment. We should be glad if the Zoological Society could now see their way to annulling the bargain for the sale of Jumbo to America, and still keeping him in London, where he has many friends and admirers.

The receipts on account of revenue from April 1, 1881, when there was a balance of £5,923,662, to Feb. 18, 1882, were £74,615,658, against £73,440,618 in the corresponding period of the preceding financial year, which began with a balance of £3,273,128. The net expenditure was £73,903,461, against £70,953,703 to the same date in the previous year. The Treasury balances on Feb. 18 amounted to £6,337,267, and at the same date in 1881 to £8,146,368.

It has been resolved to establish a Cambrian Academy of Art, in the hope that such an institution will give an impetus to the further development of art in the Principality. The objects of the academy will be the advancement of the art of painting in oil, in fresco, and in water colours; of drawing from the antique and elementary drawing; also the study of sculpture and architecture. Arrangements have been made to hold annual exhibitions during the summer months in the academy's temporary gallery, Mostyn-street, Llandudno. The inaugural exhibition will open on June 20 and close on Sept. 20 of the present year. A considerable sum has already been promised in the shape of donations and subscriptions.

BICENTENARY OF CHELSEA HOSPITAL.

King Charles II. laid the foundation-stone of Chelsea Hospital for aged and disabled soldiers on Feb. 16, 1682. The design of this institution was originated by Sir Stephen Fox, the first who held the office of Paymaster-General, the creation of a standing army dating from that reign, or from the Commonwealth. The Royal Military Hospital at Chelsea contains berths for 510 men, and there is now a separate infirmary containing one hundred beds. The Board of Commissioners, to whom is intrusted the duty of pensioning soldiers, and the management of the hospital, consists of fifteen members, each of whom holds high office of a political or military character. The sum of a million and a half is voted by Parliament annually for out-pensions; but the amount for in-pensions at Chelsea is only about £23,500, and from this a considerable reduction may be made, as the in-pensioners surrender their out-pensions. More than 80,000 men were on the Chelsea pension list last year. The gallant veterans who were last week inspected at Chelsea Hospital were only 350 in number; but they were representative of half a million of men who during the past two centuries have borne the name of Chelsea pensioners.

Field Marshal the Duke of Cambridge, the Commander-in-Chief, arrived at noon on Friday week, to visit the Royal Military Hospital, accompanied by General Whitmore. His Royal Highness was received by the Governor, Sir Patrick Grant, K.C.B.; the Lieutenant-Governor, Colonel Wadeson, V.C.; the Secretary, Major-General Hutt, C.B.; Sir Charles Ellice, Sir Garnet Wolseley, and other military men of high distinction. The Chelsea Pensioners, in full hospital uniform, were drawn up in a single line around the parade facing the chapel, looking over the grounds of the hospital towards the Thames and Battersea Park. Accompanied by his suite, the Duke began an inspection of the aged pensioners. With no pretence of criticising their deportment or appearance in any way, his Royal Highness spoke to every one of them in a friendly, sympathising tone, inquiring into their names, their regiments, the battles they had gone through, and the state of their health. There were some between eighty and ninety years of age. The Duke occupied an hour and a half in going through his inspection. His Highness having concluded his rounds, took his stand beneath the Royal Standard flying from the pole in the square. The Governor, Sir Patrick Grant, stepped forward and called for three cheers for King Charles II., the founder of the Hospital, whose statue stands in the centre of the parade.

THE PIPES OF ALL PEOPLES.

The Loan Collection of objects connected with the use of tobacco and other narcotics, belonging to Mr. William Bragge, F.S.A., F.G.S., of Birmingham, has cost thousands of pounds, and comprises above seven thousand specimens. This exhibition, which was at the Edinburgh Museum of Science and Art not long ago, and which may now be visited in London at 14 and 15, Castle-street, Leicester-square, is one of an instructive character, both as regarded from the technical or artistic, and from the ethnological point of view. It includes the pipes of many nations and different ages, French, German, Austrian, Dutch, Italian, Spanish, English, Swedish, Norwegian, and Danish, Russian, Siberian, Turkish, Egyptian, Algerine and Moorish, West African, Kafir, Australian and Polynesian, Persian, Indian, Chinese, Burmese, Malay, North American Indian, Mexican, and South American, with tobacco boxes and jars, pipe-stoppers, cigar-cases, and fire-strikers, snuff-boxes, rasps, mills, spoons, bottles, and other apparatus, not omitting the articles used in the consumption of opium and of betel-nut. The whole collection may be advantageously studied along with the perusal of such a treatise as Mr. F. W. Fairholt's "Tobacco: its History and Associations," and with the help of a special "Guide," which was compiled by Mr. C. N. Muston, of the Edinburgh Museum, and was published there by official authority. We have engraved a few drawings of a variety of specimens of "the Pipes of All Peoples."

JACK'S SWEETHEART. Song from "The Girl he Left Behind Him." Mezzo-Soprano or Baritone. Price 2s. net.

"I've got my pockets full of gold. I'll quit the sea," he cried;
"No more I'll roam, but stay at home, and Poll shall be my bride!"
Words by Delacour Daubigny; Music by MAX. SCHROETER.

A WAYSIDE POSY. Song. Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano, or Baritone. Price 2s. net.

"They strolled across the field on sunny morn in June,
When poppies peep'd among the corn, and all things seem'd stunne;
Loud buzzing were the bees, but 'love,' they say, 'is blind.'
And deaf, I think, as well, for they heard nothing of the kind."
Words and Music by MICHAEL WATSON.

TOLD IN THE TWILIGHT. Song. Contralto or Mezzo-Soprano. Price 2s. net.

I look back to childhood's summer, and a picture comes to me,
Of an open lattice window looking out across the sea;
When a mother's arm was round me, and with voice so sweet and low,
Told me tales of childhood's dreamland in the twilight long ago.
Words by F. E. Weatherly; Music by J. L. MOLLOY.

UNDER THE LAMPLIGHT. Song. Contralto or Mezzo-Soprano. Price 2s.

Under the lamplight, out in the snow,
A girl sang in accents so plaintive and low,
As weary without, while within they rejoiced,
She told her sad story with tears in her voice.
Words and Music by LOUISA GRAY.

MARMION, Canto 6, Stanza 15.

MARMION'S DEFIANCE TO DOUGLAS. BY SIR JOHN GILBERT, R.A.—SEE NEXT PAGE.
ENGRAVED BY PERMISSION OF MR. T. M'LEAN.

MARMION'S DEFIANCE TO DOUGLAS.

Who that has ever read Scott's "Marmion" can forget the incident that prompted the drawing or sketch by Sir John Gilbert, here engraved—one of the most spirited and brilliant that has ever emanated from his prolific pencil? Who can forget the energetic lines descriptive of the parting of the doughty knights, when Douglas declares that never shall his hand

In friendly grasp
The hand of such as Marmion clasp!
And Marmion, burning under the insult, retorts—
An 't were not for thy hoary beard,
Such hand as Marmion's had not spared
To cleave the Douglas' head!

And, then, after insisting that the meanest in England's state who does her message may well be proud Angus' mate, goes on—

And, Douglas, more I tell thee here,
Even in thy pitch of pride,
Here in thy hold, thy vassals near—
Nay never look upon your lord,
And lay your hands upon your sword!
I tell thee, thou'rt defied!
And if thou said'st, I am not peer
To any lord in Scotland here,
Lowland or Highland, far or near,
Lord Angus, thou hast lied!

Douglas in turn resorts to threats, and orders the drawbridge up, the portcullis down, to seize Marmion; who, however, escapes just as the bars, descending, grazed his plume.

And when Lord Marmion reached his band,
He halts, and turns with clenched hand,
And shout of loud defiance pours,
And shook his gauntlet at the towers.

This last is evidently the precise moment intended to be represented; and more we need not say to indicate the energetic conception of either poet or painter.

WILD DUCK SHOOTING.

Wild duck shooting is a pleasant pastime, if you have plenty of patience, and can stand the cold, for both are requisites and always needed; the best sport, as a rule, being usually had when the water is iced, and there is snow on the ground; for as the birds are then delightfully wild, your skill is more tested, which heightens the joy of it. Inland shooting is to be had almost anywhere, and the fens and the shores where ducks abound are so well known that they need not be specially mentioned. The term for the male wild duck is "mallard," and the brood are called "flappers" when nearly fledged; and they are readily shot in the reeds and sedges, by most rivers, ponds, and brooks, and on lakes where they settle on islands. Some of them stay, as we know, in this country; but the flocks that frequent our coasts in winter consist of those that went southward at the end of the autumn. They pair in spring, and when they breed in Britain their nests are made of grass, woven and lined with wool; and it is usually found on the ground by the water, or amongst the tussocky reeds and rushes, though they now and then build in some very queer places, as on moors, in trees, or in the disused nest of a rook, a crow, or a magpie. They lay from twelve to sixteen eggs, which are greenish-white in colour, and the time when their young are fully fledged is from ten weeks to three months from the date of hatching.

They are protected under the "Wild Birds Act" from March 1 until Aug. 1, during which time there is a penalty of five shillings for killing them; and a like penalty, with costs, is also levied for each egg unlawfully taken. In olden times, the same penalty was inflicted when ducks were captured by "tunnels, hays, or nets," between July 1 and Sept. 1—afterwards extended to Oct. 1—with, in default, this punishment—"to be committed to the House of Correction, for any time not exceeding one month nor less than fourteen days, there to be whipt and kept at hard labour;" and this law included, besides teal and widgeon, "any other water-fowl." The worst friends of wild ducks are the mischievous magpies, as they delight to steal their eggs, which, by stocking a hole in them till they stick to their beak, they take off one by one.

Wild ducks have their regular feeding-grounds, to which they wing off as the sun goes down, to return as the daylight dawns; when, if you choose to get up at an early hour, and wait in some hiding-place till they come, you may often get good shots; but, as few birds are more wary than wild ducks are, you must change your place each morning; unless, when the rest of the pool is frozen over, they have to come to one spot where the ice is broken. They are often shot, too, when the moon is up, or by sound, if the night is too dark for aim, when you blaze at the noise of their whistling wings, and your dog then fetches them out. But such a mode of performance does not compare with that daylight sport which we call flight-shooting, where a steady hand is required and a very quick eye; as in such open spots as salt-water marshes allowance must be made for brisk wind and speed, and the gun be pitched well forwards. For inland shooting, an ordinary gun will suffice for the flappers; but a long duck-gun should be always used for flight-shooting by the shore; and the time you stay and the distance done should also be duly noted, lest, through sudden fog, or the returning tide—which, by filling the creeks, may cover the ground behind you—you find yourself literally quite at sea. A black retriever is often used, but a liver-coloured one is best, as it cannot be seen so easily; and the whole of the dress should be woollen, both under and over, and a cap, not hat, be worn. That this shore-shooting is famous sport, when you are judiciously screened by a ridge or embankment, will be seen by the Illustration we give this week.

After much discussion, and the rejection of several amendments, the City Common Council have appointed a special committee of seventeen members to consider the announcement in the Queen's Speech in reference to municipal reform in London. The committee are instructed to "do therein as they may deem expedient," only reporting to the Council from time to time.

Yesterday week the seventy-sixth anniversary meeting of the Geological Society took place at the society's room, Burlington House, Piccadilly. The chair was occupied by Mr. Robert Etheridge, F.R.S., and there was a numerous attendance of members. From the report submitted by the council it appeared that the number of Fellows of the society had increased during the past year. Allusion was made in the document to the deaths of some foreign members of the society within the last twelve months, and it was added that one vacancy existed in the list of foreign correspondents. Amongst sundry matters touched upon, the report of the council made mention of surveys carried out recently in the Austrian empire. Placed before the meeting for consideration, and accompanying the statement of accounts for last year, was an estimate of the society's receipts and expenditure for the present twelve months. The estimated income from all sources amounted to £2672, and the expenditure to £2526.

THE QUEEN'S DRAWINGROOM.

The Queen held the first Drawingroom of the season at Buckingham Palace yesterday week. The Prince and Princess of Wales, the Duke of Edinburgh, Princess Christian, Princess Beatrice, the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke and Duchess of Teck, and Vice-Admiral his Serene Highness the Prince of Leiningen, G.C.B., were present. There were also in attendance the Diplomatic Corps, consisting of the Ambassadors to the Court of St. James's and the principal Ministers of the Crown and Cabinet. About eighty presentations were made to her Majesty. The following account of the dresses worn by the Queen and the Princesses is given in the Court Circular:—

The Queen wore a dress and train of black silk, trimmed with jet embroidery and fringe, and a long white tulle veil surmounted by a coronet of diamonds. Her Majesty also wore a necklace, brooches, and earrings of diamonds, the ribbon and star of the Order of the Garter; the Orders of Victoria and Albert, the Crown of India, Louise of Prussia; the Russian, Spanish, and Portuguese Orders, and the Saxe-Coburg and Gotha Family Order.

Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales wore a dress of golden brown wool (of British manufacture) over a jupe of golden brown velvet, with deep volant of brown marabout feathers bordered in gold, with a train of velvet lined in wool and bordered in marabouts and gold. Head-dress, a tiara of diamonds, feathers, and veil; Indian ornaments; and the Orders of Victoria and Albert, the Crown of India, St. Catharine of Russia, and the Danish Family Order.

Her Royal Highness Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein wore a dress of pearl grey satin handsomely trimmed with old Irish point, pearl trimmings, and bunches of red poppies. Ornaments, diamonds and emeralds; head-dress, a tiara of diamonds, plumes and veil. Orders: the Victoria and Albert, the Crown of India, St. Catharine of Russia, the Saxe-Coburg and Gotha Family Order, the Prussian Order for Care of the Sick and Wounded, the Order of Louise of Prussia, and the Order of St. John of Jerusalem.

Her Royal Highness Princess Beatrice wore a train of two shades of Etruscan satin with a dress of cream, and gold Etruscan brocade with bouquets of flowers. Head-dress, feathers, veil, and diamonds. Ornaments, diamonds. Orders: Victoria and Albert, the Crown of India, and the Saxe-Coburg and Gotha Family Order.

"PRIMROSES, SWEET PRIMROSES."

In an ordinary season—when the snows of winter have been slowly melted, and the earth looks brown where white wreaths had hid it—the end of February is a pleasant time to those who dwell in the country; as to the wintry stillness then has come both sound and movement, and the signs of life, go where you will, for there is a flutter of birds and a stir on the farms as the wheat-sowers' work proceeds. From the stubbles and pastures come bird-cries, and bird-songs from each thicket and wood; whilst from hedgerows and shrub-beries blackbirds are flying, and you hear the notes of the robin and thrush; their pauses being filled by the wood-pigeons' coo, as they settle themselves in the turnips. Magpies, too, chatter to the jays in orchards, as young lambs scamper in the fields hard by; while, as jackdaws clamour at the raven's croak, the rooks follow close to the ploughman's heels, as he steadily shapes the furrows, to the musical sound of the clinking gears, and the moist smell of the upturned soil. Nor is insect life, on a mild day, absent, as the Brimstone butterfly will be often seen, with gnats and some winter moths, such as the Eggar, on elms and in hawthorn hedges, and the Usher, on old oak trunks; for plant-life now shows, in its bud and bloom, that the joyous spring is waking.

Plant-life was loved by that rare old Gerarde, who dwelt on this time of year; and when he tells of its "robe of embroidered worke," we think of the woods with their spangle of pale primroses, and of the spot where our lost ones lie; for both daisies and primroses decked our dead, as in the country is the custom—"the primrose for the grown-up girl, the daisy for the child." Thus—"emblem of early sweetness, early death"—the primrose, in some districts, has much meaning; and in towns it is favoured for its simple beauty, though it is there only associated with the return of spring. But to fully appreciate its special charm, we must go to the woods and get it; as we then shall find—where the grey-green moss and the red leaves lie—how its tufts "embroider" the banks they grow on. "Welcome pale primrose, starting up," says Clare, "between dead matted leaves of ash and oak, that strew the wood and spinney. How much thy presence beautifies the ground." With children it is a great favourite; and when they are sat in circles on the primrose knolls, to there make "posies," they know no greater pleasure.

Earlier in this month than we had heard for years, came the welcome cry of the primrose-seller—"Primroses, sweet primroses;" bringing with it glad visions of nooks and dells in the Kentish lanes and copses, from whence each season we have been supplied with "Spring's first woodland flower." But from Kent no longer comes the chief supply, as Worcestershire now is known to be a more fertile county for them, the roots there being more widespread and the blooms far finer. Employment hence, has now been found for the women and children in most of the villages, and they get, as "pickers," good wages at it, as is also the case with snowdrops and daffodils, which grow wild in the cottage crofts. "Field-hands" through the spring months, are therefore scarce, as well as for some time after; as this work goes on whilst such flowers last, as the violet, hyacinth, cowslip, and orchis. Nor does it cease altogether then; as from the time when the ferns unfold their fronds, until autumn comes to tinge them, vast quantities of them are sent each week—to Manchester, Liverpool, London, and York—to supply the different markets. This wild-flower trade, which has thus sprung up, is, from this cause, not liked by the farmers there; but it is greatly valued by those in town, for the glimpse it gives of the country; and for the chance it affords to gladden the hearts of the ailing poor and lowly, who love such flowers as tell of sequestered lanes and of woods where the birds sing gaily.

In a Convocation held at Oxford on the 16th inst. the nomination of Mr. Edward Williams Byron Nicholson, M.A., Trinity College, who was recently elected by the Bodleian Curators to the office of librarian of that institution, in the place of the late Mr. Coxe, was confirmed.

Lord Windsor has written to the Town Clerk of Cardiff stating that, provided Cardiff is selected by the Government as the site for the proposed Welsh National College, he will contribute £1000. The Cardiff contributions have reached £20,000, in addition to a Corporation site worth about £10,000.

The high tide and probable overflow of the river Thames predicted between Feb. 18 and 20 took place on Sunday afternoon, when the river reached two feet above high-water mark at three p.m. at London Bridge. All the low-lying parts along the river bank were more or less flooded. The tide was also high, and losses were occasioned to those living near the water, at some places on the east and southern coasts. Another high tide was experienced by the dwellers on the shores of the Thames on Monday; but, although the water rose considerably above high-water mark, no overflow took place in the metropolis. The Medway, however, flooded vast tracts of land around Chatham. At Liverpool the tides both of Sunday and Monday were most remarkable; in the Dee the rush of water was so violent as to wash up the body of Mrs. Millet's dead child from the bottom of the river after lying there for six weeks. There have been high tides in Scotland also.

THE IMPERIAL DICTIONARY.

The second volume of the new and augmented edition of Dr. John Ogilvie's "Imperial Dictionary of the English Language" has been issued by the publishers, Messrs. Blackie and Son. This valuable work, revised and improved by Mr. Charles Annandale, will be completed in four volumes, to be published at intervals of four months, terminating in November of the present year. The task of thoroughly revising and correcting the former "Imperial Dictionary," and adding thirty thousand new entries, has occupied above ten years. The English language has grown so much since the production of current editions of Dr. Johnson's lexicography, and the first edition of the American Webster, that the number of words now to be found in this "Imperial Dictionary" is 130,000, being double the vocabulary of those former collections. Modern scientific terms, and those of technical use, words belonging to the literature of this and preceding ages, from the sixteenth century onward, colloquial expressions, peculiar idioms, and even slang phrases current in books of the lighter class, make a large addition to the regular stock of standard English admitted by correct writers a hundred years ago. All this will be found in the new edition of the "Imperial Dictionary," each word having its pronunciation phonetically indicated, with the authentic etymological derivation, which latter accompaniment has been supplied entirely afresh, in the present revision, keeping up with the researches of the philologists during the past twenty years. The pronunciation of Greek, Latin, Hebrew, and other proper names, and of geographical names, is further shown in separate lists. The Imperial Dictionary partakes, to a certain extent, of the character of an Encyclopædia, being not merely a word-book, but also giving some knowledge of things in the manner of that useful little work, "Buchan's Technological Dictionary." We open it, for example, at the letter F, and we find set forth on two pages, along with many other words not requiring special explanation, a compact little essay upon each of the different meanings of the noun substantive "feather," in animal physiology, in mechanics, engineering, and joinery, besides its metaphorical and figurative uses. The terms "Febronianism," "Fecial," "Federal," "Fee," and "Fief" are not merely interpreted or paraphrased, but explained by a brief analytic statement of the idea or system referred to. The definition, for instance, of "fee" or "fief," in the feudal law and in the common law of England, here presented in about twenty lines, is sufficiently exact and complete for any student. "Honeysuckle," again, is quite a little botanical treatise; and "Humming-bird" is a miniature chapter of ornithology, with a pretty little picture. The work is adorned with more than three thousand small wood engravings, which are very neatly executed, and will often help the understanding of precise descriptions. Letter K is disposed of in the second volume of this "Imperial Dictionary," so that half the editor's task has been accomplished with great success.

FINE ARTS.

THE WATER-COLOUR DRAWINGS OF BIRKET FOSTER.

The growing practice of exhibiting the works of one artist by themselves is a test which comparatively few men can undergo with credit. The Watts exhibition at the Grosvenor Gallery is a successful example of this kind of display, and another has just been opened by Messrs. Vokins at their galleries in Great Portland-street, Oxford-street, consisting of a selection from the works of Mr. Birket Foster. No more convincing proof can be adduced of the popularity of Mr. Foster's art than the very numerous reproductions of his works in chromolithography. But it is a great mistake to suppose that this artist's field of labour is confined to picturesque cottages and rustic children. The visitor need only look round the present collection to be convinced that Mr. Foster's genius lends itself with ease to the most diverse subjects. From the somewhat smoky atmosphere of the artist's native Tyne he ranges over the hills and rivers of Scotland, through the leafy lanes of Surrey and Sussex, the picturesque beauties of the Rhine, the glories of the Italian lakes, the shrines and shops of Brittany, and the palaces and lagoons of Venice. In "The New Purchase"—an enthusiast surrounded by his treasures of old china—he has with loving patience produced a work of marvellous truth and exactness; and William Hunt's famous "Red Herrings" is rivalled by the "Studies of Fish at Venice." The wide range of Mr. Foster's powers is further shown by the fine drawing of "Greenwich," "The Falls of the Tummel," "Exercising Hounds," "The Timber Waggon," and "Fish-Stall near the Rialto." The collection is altogether charming, and the visitor is enabled to take a comprehensive view of some of the best works of one of our most popular water-colour painters.

The exhibition (which is free) consists of more than one hundred works, which have been kindly lent by their owners; and will remain open until April 1.

Messrs. Agnew have opened their annual Exhibition of water-colour drawings at their gallery in Bond-street. As usual, the collection consists of generally select and often important works by deceased and living artists, together with a few remarkable drawings by foreign painters.

A loan collection of works by the late John Linnell is on view at Messrs. Tooth's gallery in the Haymarket. The proceeds are to be given to the Artists' General Benevolent Institution.

A collection of sketches of the Riviera, from Marseilles to Mentone, by Mr. Pownall Williams, is on view at Mr. McLean's gallery in the Haymarket.

Mr. Sargent's picture of "The House of Commons," together with an etching of the picture by the artist, are on view at Messrs. Gladwell's gallery, Gracechurch-street.

Mr. Edward Joseph's fine collection of miniatures, by the late Richard Cosway, R.A., have been removed from the Ryde Art Exhibition, recently closed, to the exhibition now being held in the County Hall, Lewes, Sussex, for the benefit of the School of Art in that town.

Messrs. Christie, Manson, and Woods concluded last Saturday the sale of an extensive and valuable collection of water-colour drawings and pictures formed by the well-known amateur the late Mr. John Henderson, of Russell-square.

The Aberdeen Town Council has voted £1000 from the Common Good Fund towards the foundation of an art gallery and museum.

The British Archaeological Association have accepted an invitation to hold their next annual congress at Plymouth.

At the meeting of the Metropolitan Asylums Board last Saturday it was stated that the estimated amount to be assessed on the various parishes and unions was £226,000. Resolutions passed at a recent conference of Metropolitan Guardians condemnatory of the lavish expenditure of the Board and declaring that a Parliamentary Commission should be appointed, and read and acknowledged.

ROYAL INSTITUTION LECTURES.

MECHANISM OF THE SENSES.

Professor McKendrick began his fifth lecture on Tuesday, the 14th inst., with remarks on the great delicacy of the sense of touch which may be acquired by education. He then considered the sensation of temperature, the perception of heat and cold, by nerves distributed to the skin and varying in different parts. The muscular sense, which differs from the feeling of contact or pressure, was next described as regulating all the movements of the body, and allusions were made to the phenomena of "unconscious cerebration," investigated by Dr. Carpenter. By means of this, a number of very delicate muscular actions are going on without our knowledge, as in the acts of walking and reading. Reference was made to the disease termed "ataxia," whereby persons are unable to walk straight unless they see their feet or a chalked line. The causes of the sensations of hunger and thirst were considered, and the way in which they may be artificially relieved. The Professor then began his description of the apparatus connected with the sense of sight, and commented on the remarkable analogies of the arrangements of the eye with those of the camera obscura.

GEOGRAPHICAL DISTRIBUTION OF ANIMALS.

Mr. P. L. Sclater, Ph.D., F.R.S., Secretary of the Zoological Society, gave the first of a course of four lectures on Thursday, the 16th instant. After enlarging upon the universal distribution of life over the earth's surface, he stated that, as a general rule, the plants and animals of far removed countries are different, and those of near countries alike. Difference of climate will not account for this; some other cause must be looked for. He then described the classification of animals into families, genera, and species, and showed that each species tenanted a particular or specific area, which, as a rule, is continuous. The same, theoretically at least, is the case with the higher groups. Their areas of distribution are of every size, some being very much restricted, others co-extensive with the world's surface. Some general notion as to the mode in which animals are distributed having been given, the lecturer selected mammals as a special group, for discussion, in order to ascertain the primary divisions of the world's surface in regard to animal life, and showed that primarily three divisions would be found, which might be termed "Notogæa"—i.e., 1. Australia and its islands; 2. "Dendrogea," i.e., Central America; 3. "Arctogæa," North America and the three continents of Europe, Asia, and Africa, the last being readily separable into four subdivisions. The six regions established for mammals are:—1. Palearctic (Europe, Africa, north of the Atlas, and of North Asia); 2. Ethiopian (Africa, South of the Atlas); 3. Indian (Southern Asia and the Islands of the Indian Archipelago); 4. Nearctic (North America down to the Isthmus of Tehuantepec); 5. Neotropical (Central and South America); 6. Australian (Australia, New Guinea, and the Pacific Islands). These six divisions, originally proposed by Mr. Sclater in 1857 in relation to birds, have been adopted by Mr. Wallace in his great work on Geographical Distribution, and are now used by naturalists.

THE BREATHING OF FISHES.

Professor McKendrick gave the discourse at the evening meeting on Friday, the 17th instant. After defining respiration as interchange between the gases of the organism and the gases of the medium in which it lives, a short description was given of the various modes by which this is effected; as in simple forms of animal life, where no special respiratory apparatus is required; and in higher forms, where we meet with bronchiae, or gills; and, lastly, lungs. He then spoke of the blood as a respiratory as well as a nutritive medium in the higher animals, and showed that all living tissues breathe in a sense similar to the breathing of aquatic organisms. After showing the spectrum of blood (indicating the presence of oxygen in the fluid), circulated by the still living heart of a frog, he found that the blood became of a darker colour, through the consumption of oxygen by the working heart; and the spectrum became that of blood deprived of oxygen. The mechanical arrangements for the breathing of fishes were described, and it was shown how the movements of the gills are recorded on a drum. That the form of curve is not the same in various fishes was shown by numerous examples. The conditions of respiration were next considered—viz., the tension of the gases on each side of the membrane, and the nature of the membrane itself, and also the laws regulating the solution of gases by fluids, which have a very important influence in respiration. It was then shown that fishes breathe in a medium containing only a small amount of oxygen, and reference was made to the great probability of carbonic acid in water being a condition favouring the escape of blood from the fish. Large fish consume about nine times less oxygen than man, while small fish apparently have greater respiratory activity, and consume more oxygen, but always several times less than man. To make this more obvious, and to enable one to compare large bodies with small, it was stated that so much oxygen was absorbed per kilogramme (about two pounds) of body weight of man and of fish. Finally, Dr. McKendrick referred to the just claims of physiologists as workers in the most obscure and difficult department of physical science.

THE GREEK LANGUAGE AND MYTHOLOGY.

Mr. W. Watkiss Lloyd gave the first of a course of four lectures on the "Iliad" and "Odyssey" on Saturday last, the 18th instant. After commenting on the great services of the Greeks to civilisation in its largest sense, as compared with other ancient nations, and alluding to the genius of the people expressed in their poetry, which must first be studied in its own language, he contrasted Greek with Latin, the nearest of the cognate tongues. He then referred to the exceptional power, modifying genius, and deep sense of euphony, strikingly evident in the development of the Greek language. The peculiarity of accent and the relation of the language to metaphor and personification were shown to have greatly facilitated the growth of a poetical mythology, which was illustrated by a notice of the state of belief in the times anterior to Homer and Hesiod. After characterising the beauty of Greek mythology, Mr. Lloyd controverted the opinions of K. Otfried Müller, Grote, and others, that this mythology must be explained by an arbitrary philosophical theory, that a myth is substantially an untruth clothed unconsciously in the semblance of truth and seriously received as truth, whereas Mr. Lloyd apprehends that it is quite as frequently an aspect of physical, moral, or even historical truth deliberately clothed in a picturesque garb of untruth for the sake of poetical effect. Strauss's "Life of Jesus" was referred to as an example of Müller's theory, and a demonstration of its insufficiency to account for the facts. In conclusion, Mr. Lloyd expressed his disagreement with those who style Homer's poetry the Bible of the Greeks, and as so considered by them. Homer is the illustrator of nature and of human nature, and it is in virtue of his profound truth that he becomes indirectly an expositor of morals by exhaustive and accurate definition of all shades of the colour of good and evil. For this cause we may properly call him the Shakespeare of the Greeks; and this implies the existence of a contemporary cultivated class of minds fully able to appreciate him.

RELIGIOUS AND BENEVOLENT OBJECTS.

The Prince and Princess of Wales, Princess Louise, Princess Mary Adelaide, and the Duke of Teck and suite were present on Monday evening at the fancy costume ball of the Bolingbroke Pay Hospital at the Royal Albert Hall. Nearly 600 guests were present, and the scene was much admired by the Royal party, who remained a considerable time.

The Duke of Edinburgh presided last Saturday evening at the annual festival dinner of the Cabdrivers' Benevolent Association. In proposing the toast of the evening, the Royal chairman stated that about 1000 cabmen belong to the association, the capital of which amounts to £6000. There are eighteen annuitants on the books, while in cases of exceptional distress special donations are made. Subscriptions to the amount of £846 were announced.

Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein took part in an amateur concert given on Monday night at the British Orphan Asylum, Slough, in aid of the fund for the enlargement of Upton parish church. The orchestra included Sir George Elvey, organist of St. George's Chapel, and a number of lady and gentlemen amateurs; among the ladies being several violinists. In the course of the programme, which consisted of madrigals, songs, and instrumental music, Princess Christian gave the pianoforte solo "Sarabande," J. S. Bach; "Ballo," Gluck; "Lieder Ohne Worte," Mendelssohn; and "Polonaise," Monisku; which were played with delicacy and brilliancy of expression, eliciting considerable applause from the audience. The concert concluded with the National Anthem.

The fortieth annual ball in aid of the French Benevolent Society was held on Monday night, at Willis's Rooms, and was attended by the Comte d'Aunay, Baron d'Estournelles, Comte de la Chauvinière, and Colonel Deschamps, of the French Embassy, and the French Consul-General. In all, more than 350 persons were present. A number of valuable gifts from the Comte de Paris, Duke de Nemours, Prince de Joinville, Duke de Chartres, Duke d'Alençon, and other patrons of the society, were disposed of for the benefit of the funds during the evening.

The claims of the society for befriending young girls in the metropolis were warmly advocated at a meeting held at Stafford House yesterday week, it being stated by some of the speakers that the efforts made to promote the religious, moral, and social welfare of young women had been attended with much success.

A numerous company attended on Wednesday week the annual dinner of the Warehousemen and Clerks' Schools. The Marquis of Hartington presided, and urged the special claims of the institution to the continued support of the class for whose benefit it had been founded. Contributions amounting to £2030 were received.

At the annual festival of the North London, or University College Hospital, on Wednesday week, under the presidency of the Duke of Cambridge, Lord Kimberley rebuked the lukewarmness with which appeals on behalf of the great metropolitan hospitals are too often received. His Lordship intimated that the time was not far distant when aid would have to be granted from public funds, a measure which, for his part, he would not shrink from advocating. In response to the earnest appeal of the Royal chairman the sum of £1530 was subscribed towards the needs of the charity.

Mr. S. Morley, M.P., on Saturday last presented the prizes gained by the members of the Ladies' Sanitary Association. Dr. B. W. Richardson read a report, from which it appeared that seventy-five applications had been sent in for admission to the examination, out of which number fifty-nine applicants had gone through it in full. Some of the questions, especially those upon the brain, which was a most difficult and complex subject, had been admirably answered.

At a meeting on Monday of the executive committee of the Mansion House Fund for the Relief of Jews in Russia it was stated that the fund now amounted to over £50,000. A special sub-committee was appointed to deal with Jewish refugees in Galicia, by selecting places in which agricultural settlements might be formed. A large number of Jewish emigrants took passage on board the Persian Monarch, at Gravesend, on Monday, bound for America.

The Lord Mayor on Monday afternoon presided at the opening of the St. Bride's Youths' Institute and Reading-room in Shoe-lane, Fleet-street. The institute building, originally a large warehouse, has been admirably adapted and suitably fitted to accommodate 250 members, there being a gymnasium, bath-rooms, a refreshment-room, reading and class rooms, &c. It is intended to have, in connection with the institution, weekly lectures, entertainments, a savings bank, clothing club, band of hope, evening classes, &c. The trustees of St. Bride's Charities contributed £500 towards the cost of the building.

In aid of the Railway Guards' Universal Friendly Society, Waterloo district, a concert was given on Thursday evening, in the Drill-Hall Kingston, under the immediate patronage of Princess Frederica of Hanover. Viscountess Folkestone took part in the entertainment.

A party of Etonians, members of a house Philo-Thespian Society gave, last Saturday, at St. Mark's Hall, Victoria Park, a performance in aid of the Working Men's Club and Institute, Hackney-wick, where the school has lately started a mission. The first piece was Morton's farce of "Sent to the Tower," which was acted with great spirit. After the farce Mr. R. F. Smith sang the "Muddle Puddle Porter." The next piece was the drama "A Fairy's Father," and the performance concluded with the farce "No. 1 Round the Corner."

The Goldsmiths' Company have presented £100 to the missionary funds of the Religious Tract Society.

An amateur concert is to be given at Willis's Rooms next Monday evening. A most attractive programme is promised. The concert, which is under the patronage of the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh and Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne), is to be given in aid of the Charing-cross Hospital, which stands in great need of subscriptions and donations.

An appeal is made on behalf of the many thousands of bed-ridden or convalescent patients in the fifty-one London hospitals, for light literature, such as is best and most fittingly afforded by "innocent, amusing, one-volume novels, Christmas and holiday numbers of illustrated papers and magazines," and the like. Parcels addressed to the head porters of the Westminster or Charing-cross Hospitals will be gratefully received.

Arrangements for the Royal Counties Agricultural Show at Brighton in June next are progressing favourably. The whole of Preston Park has been secured, Mr. Bennett Stanford having agreed to favourable terms. He offers a prize of £20 for Hampshire Down sheep. The Duke of Norfolk, who has accepted the office of president, has sent £100 to the guarantee fund, in addition to giving a special prize. The Race Stand Committee subscribe £100 for thoroughbred horses, £50 in prizes are offered by the Brighton Harriers subscribers, and £30 comes from another quarter for Channel Islands cattle.

POETRY.

Imputations of a fearful nature, as many of us are aware, have been made upon the character and origin of the English sonnet; it has been said not only to have no principles of its own, but, more than that, to be the illegitimate offspring of the Italian muse. The age of chivalry is past, and, a thousand swords can no longer be expected to leap from their scabbards at such insolent provocation; but in the preface of a handsome volume entitled Sonnets of Three Centuries, edited by T. Hall Caine (Eliot Stock), the English sonnet is vindicated with much subtle and learned argument, and with at least as much enthusiasm as the vindication required, from the aspersions which have been thrown upon it. The editor tells us what is the fundamental difference between the true Italian and the true English sonnet; and explains in a manner which would probably make Petrarch and Shakespeare, could they read his preface together, regard one another with wonder and join in a hearty laugh of mingled incredulity and amusement, how each was led by a distinct mental process to adopt a perfectly distinct arrangement of thought and a perfectly distinct mechanical structure. The editor admits that there is just a question whether the two poets might not have been "merely sensible of having something to say and of saying it by the vehicle that comes nearest to their hand;" but he argues that, however that may be, "the accuracy of the analysis would remain undisturbed." So be it; we have long been accustomed to understand that it is for great poets to write great things, and for critics to explain to them (in the Shades or elsewhere), and to us, how they came to do it, and what they meant by what they did. Let us acquiesce, then, in the statement that "the Italian form demands two parts to the sonnet-thought, but that they are as the two parts of an acorn;" that in the earlier English form the thought does not "fall asunder like an acorn into unequal parts of a perfect organism, but is sustained without break until it reaches a point at which a personal appropriation needs to be made;" and that "the later English form requires also two sides to the sonnet-thought, but they are as the two movements of a wave," the flow and the ebb. We may personally incline towards a belief that a better illustration of the sonnet would be to say that in the "octave" the treasure is, or should be, slowly opened to the reader's gaze, and in the "sestet" gradually shut up again in its casket, which is closed, as it were, with a snap, in the last two lines. However, the editor has collected a charming series of English sonnets, chronologically disposed, from Edmund Spenser, who is more celebrated than read, to Walter Herries Pollock, who may be more read, but is not yet quite so celebrated. There are some voluminous notes at the end of the book, and they will be found most interesting and instructive; but the editor's arguments would probably have been rendered clearer and more persuasive had he thought proper to give some half-dozen specimens of Petrarch's own work.

Surprise is nearly always, though not invariably, pleasant in a world in which it is naturally the disagreeable that we are led by experience to anticipate; and in Pygmalion: by Thomas Woolner (Macmillan and Co.), one is agreeably surprised to find a very hackneyed subject treated with singular originality and freshness. It must be acknowledged that the author, with his twofold talent, was eminently qualified to deal with the theme which he has chosen; and his admirers are likely to be more than indifferently well satisfied with his performance. He is full of fancy, grace, and picturesqueness, and he is by no means devoid of passion; but whether his poetic faculty amounts to downright inspiration, and whether his diction and numbers are not spoiled sometimes by fantastic affectation, are questions which may be left open for the reader to decide. The author, with the aid of imagination, has expanded the story of Pygmalion far beyond the limits within which it is usually confined, and has occupied twelve "books," not long books, however, in telling it. The main incident in the legendary life of Pygmalion, the incident of which so many poets, ancient and modern, have sung, is handled in a very novel fashion, with a gain, no doubt, of probability, but with a proportionate loss, as many readers will think, of the charm that belongs to the supernatural: Pygmalion, in fact, is represented as having married his model, instead of, as heretofore, the inanimate statue quickened into life by the power of Aphrodite. The old idea is thus, manifestly, vulgarised; and, indeed, all the portions of the poem which describe the occurrences connected with Pygmalion's studio, so to speak, remind one of St. John's-wood in our practical days than of Cyprus in the age of myths and miracles. It must not be imagined, however, that Pygmalion's model was professional, like the "young person" of this generation; she was a noble maiden who was in attendance upon Pygmalion's mother, and who "postured" for his statue of Hebe as gratuitously as any marriageable young lady can be expected to perform such an office for a particularly eligible "parti." And so she became Queen of Cyprus, as is duly recorded in the elegant verses of Mr. Thomas Woolner.

"Sonat certè Deam," it is certainly the song of the Muse that is sung in Under the Aspens: by Emily Pfeiffer (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.), though the muse be somewhat neglectful occasionally of her English grammar. Nobody can read the piece entitled "The Pillar of Praise" without feeling that the writer may claim of right an honourable place among the lyrists and the composers of the good old-fashioned ballad, the poets and poetesses whose thoughts and descriptions find easy, spontaneous utterance in simple, melodious verse. Some of the poems betray a wonderful intensity of feeling, so powerful as to carry the reader completely away, and to cause forgetfulness of the fact that a very common-place theme, such as an ordinary amour between a milliner and the stroke-oar of a University "eight," is treated in a disproportionately elevated strain. Unless, indeed, a broken heart may be considered sufficient to redeem any subject whatever from a charge of paltriness. But then the antecedents and the concomitants should be so handled as to make the tragic catastrophe apprehended as a probability. Among the sonnets, of which there are several specimens inserted in the volume, one has already achieved the distinction of being included in a collection, if not in more than one collection, of representative English sonnets. Of the drama, in five acts, which occupies the greater part of the volume, it is scarcely necessary to say more than that the play is submitted on appeal to the opinion of the public, who are requested to judge between the writer and certain theatrical managers, as to whether the latter were right or wrong in refusing their co-operation for the purpose of bringing the work before an audience on the stage. At least this appears to be the meaning of some rather mysterious remarks in the preface, wherein the writer complains of "the treatment to which authors are liable at the hands of managers." If we are simply to infer that the managers refused to put the play upon the stage, they were probably induced to do so by a belief that it would be unsuccessful, a belief which will most likely be shared by many readers for reasons totally independent of its literary merits or defects.

OBITUARY.

LADY LETHBRIDGE.

Ann Williams, Lady Lethbridge, died on the 11th inst., at Sandhill Park, Taunton. Her Ladyship was the second daughter of Mr. Thomas Benyon, of Thorp Arch, Yorkshire, and was married, Oct. 29, 1861, to Sir Wroth Acland Lethbridge, present Baronet, of Sandhill Park, by whom she leaves four sons and three daughters.

COLONEL G. P. CAMERON.

Colonel George Poulett Cameron, C.B., K.T.S., who died on the 12th inst., at Cheltenham, in his seventy-seventh year, was the only surviving son of Captain Robert Cameron, R.N. He served in the South Malakka campaign, 1825-6, and in the Civil War in Portugal, including the siege of Oporto, 1832 to 1834. He was subsequently employed in Turkey, Persia, Asia Minor, the Caucasus, and Russia. Colonel Cameron married Louisa Agnes Alava, daughter of Colonel Sir Thomas Stephen Sorel, K.C.H. He was author of "Adventures in Georgia, Circassia, and Russia."

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL A. W. D. BURTON.

Lieutenant-Colonel Adolphus William Desart Burton, C.B., late 7th Dragoon Guards, died at Pau, on the 11th inst. He was born in 1827, the third son of Lieutenant Benjamin Burton (son of Sir Charles Burton, second Baronet, of Pollington, in the county of Carlisle), by Grace Ann, his wife, only child of Mr. William Roberts, of Gloucester-place, Portman-square, and was thus brother to the present Sir Charles William Cuffe Burton, Bart., to whom he was heir-presumptive. He served in the Eastern campaign of 1854-5, and commanded the 5th Dragoon Guards at the battles of Balaklava, Inkerman, and Tchernaya, and at Sebastopol. For these services he received the medal with three clasps, Brevet of Major, the decoration of C.B., the fifth class of the Medjidie, and the Turkish medal.

MR. H. J. PERCY.

Mr. Hugh Josceline Percy, of Eskrigg, Wigton, Cumberland, J.P. and D.L. for that county, late of the 7th Hussars, died on the 9th inst., at Dumfries, aged sixty-four. He was third son of the Hon. and Right Rev. Hugh Percy, D.D., Bishop of Carlisle, by Mary, his first wife, eldest daughter of Charles Manners Sutton, Archbishop of Canterbury, and was, consequently, youngest brother of Mr. Algernon Charles Herbert Percy, of Hodnet Hall, and nephew of George, second Earl of Beverley, who became, in 1865, fifth Duke of Northumberland.

MR. H. S. CHAPMAN.

Mr. Henry Samuel Chapman, formerly a Judge of the Supreme Court of New Zealand, at Dunedin, in that colony, aged seventy-eight. He was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in 1840; and in 1843 was appointed to the judgeship in New Zealand, which he relinquished in 1852 for the post of Colonial Secretary of Van Diemen's Land. He was elected a member of the Legislative Council of Victoria in 1855, and on two occasions held the office of Attorney-General there. Until a few years back he was law lecturer at Melbourne University. Mr. Chapman contributed to the Encyclopædia Britannica, and to various periodicals, amongst others, the Westminster Review.

We have also to record the deaths of—

The Rev. George Gould, a well-known Baptist minister, at Norwich. In 1879-80 he was President of the Baptist Union.

The Ven. James Hunter, D.D., late Archdeacon of Cumberland, Rupert's Land, and for the past fourteen years Vicar of St. Matthew's, Bayswater, on the 12th inst., at Leicester-square, in his sixty-fifth year.

The Rev. Joshua W. Brooks, M.A., Rector of Ponton, Hon. Canon of Lincoln, and late Vicar of St. Mary's, Nottingham, on the 15th inst., aged eighty-two.

The Rev. James Boys, Rector of Biddenden, Kent, recently, at the age of eighty-nine. He had been Rector of the parish for upwards of forty years.

The Hon. George Edgumbe, uncle to the Earl of Mount-Edgumbe on the 18th inst., at his residence, Stone Hall, Stonehouse, in his eighty-two.

The Hon. John Constable Maxwell, son of William, thirteenth Lord Herries, by his wife, Marcia, eldest daughter of the late Hon. Sir Edward Marmaduke Vavasour, on the 16th inst., at Westwood Park, in his twenty-seventh year.

Mr. James Hope, Deputy Keeper of the Signet, on the 14th inst., at Avenel, Edinburgh, aged seventy-eight. He was last surviving son of the Right Hon. Charles Hope, by Lady Charlotte, his wife, eighth daughter of John, second Earl of Hopetoun. He married, in 1828, Elizabeth, daughter of the Right Hon. David Boyle, and had five sons and three daughters.

The Rev. William Cecil, Rector of Longstanton St. Michael, Cambridgeshire, since 1823, on the 10th inst., in his ninetieth year. He was last surviving son of the Rev. Richard Cecil, Fellow of Magdalen College, Cambridge, where he himself graduated and became a Fellow.

Commander Henry Harrow, R.N., on the 12th inst., at The Manor House, Woodside, Lymington, in his ninetieth year. He entered the Royal Navy seventy-four years ago, and served in the West Indies, the Baltic, and the Channel. He married, in 1834, Ann, daughter of Mr. E. D. Bridger, of Barton Farm.

Mr. Francis Ruddle, at Peterborough, recently, aged eighty-four. He was associated with the revival of Gothic architecture, and was connected with Sir Gilbert Scott and others in the restoration of several ecclesiastical edifices. He personally superintended the restoration of her Majesty's private chapel at Windsor.

Charlotte, the Hon. Lady Grey, widow of General the Hon. Sir Henry Grey, K.C.B., on the 12th inst., at 7, Seamore-place, Curzon-street, in her ninety-fourth year. Her Ladyship was the only daughter of Sir Charles Des Vœux, first Baronet, of Indiville, Queen's County, and was married, Aug. 20, 1812, to General the Hon. Sir Henry George Grey, G.C.B., G.C.H., who left her a widow Jan. 11, 1845.

A discussion took place at the meeting of the Metropolitan Board of Works yesterday week upon the Paddington Park Bill. It was resolved by a majority that if the promoters of the measure would give an undertaking to alter it in a manner satisfactory to the board they would discontinue their opposition and contribute a sum equal to £1000 per acre towards the cost of the purchase of the ground required for the formation of the proposed park, the money to be paid on the ground being conveyed to the board.—A crowded meeting of persons liable to be rated under the provisions of the Paddington Park Bill was held on Thursday night at St. John's School, Kilburn, Sir Thomas Chambers, Q.C., M.P., in the chair. Sir Thomas urged the great need for the park, and brought forward in support of his statement the fact that three-fourths of the persons who were liable to be especially rated had signed the petition in favour of the bill. General Lowry, C.B., moved a resolution to the effect that it was desirable that the land proposed for the site of the park should be acquired for that purpose. This was seconded by the Rev. Mitchell Cox, and carried.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All communications relating to this department of the Paper should be addressed to the Editor, and have the word "Chess" written on the envelope.

HARRY (Crediton).—The Black Pawn is wanted at K 5th in No. 1979 to prevent a check on the White King should Black after the moves 1. Kt to K 2nd, P takes Kt; 2. R to Q 3rd, play 2. P takes Kt (Queening).

J. G. (Worthing).—As every Pawn advanced to the eighth square can be promoted to any piece, except a King, it follows that you can have two or more Queens, three or more Knights, Bishops, and Rooks on the board at the same time.

H. H. (Broadmoor).—Your problem shall be examined. Have you not sent it before?

P. P. (Kentish Town Club).—The letter, we regret to say, has not been received; and we are, therefore, unable to put you in communication with the correspondent who made the inquiry.

PIGMEI (Preston).—In No. 1981 is not 1. R to B 4th a good reply to 1. B to K 3rd? We shall be glad to hear from you whenever you are disposed to write.

A return match between the Croydon and South Norwood Clubs was played on the 8th inst., twelve competitors on each side. Of the twenty-two games decided, Croydon scored twelve and Norwood ten.

The Oxford University Club was victorious in a match played against the Oxford City Club on the 10th inst. There were twelve players a side, and the University scored fourteen games to eight in favour of the City.

The fourth class of the City of London Club engaged in a match with the members of the Railway Clearing House Club on the 13th inst., and scored six games to three.

The match between the Oxford University and the Knight class of the City of London Chess Club was played at Oxford on Saturday last, the 15th inst. There were twelve players a side, and the match resulted, as will be seen from the following score, in a victory for the City of London Club by one point.

Knotley Hall, Leigh, near Penshurst Station, Kent, the residence of Lady Harriet Warde, was entered on Friday night, the 17th inst., by burglars, who carried off a large quantity of jewellery. The entry was effected, with the aid of ladders, through the dressing-room window.

Among the papers found in the possession of the woman Fearnex at Birmingham is one dated in 1878, in which she makes a general confession of her misdeeds up to that time. The document was written when she was suffering from severe illness. The Treasury have undertaken the prosecution. Some further extraordinary documents have been published in connection with these frauds. Many of them profess to be letters from Lord Coleridge, and are remarkable for their peculiar legal phraseology.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated Aug. 18, 1877) of Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas Butler, 13th Hussars, formerly of No. 1, Gore-street, South Kensington, but late of No. 66, Princes-gate, Hyde Park, who died on Dec. 16 last, was proved on the 9th inst. by Thomas Butler, the father, and Sir James Robert Carmichael, Bart., the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to more than £130,000. The testator leaves his furniture, plate, linen, china, books, and effects at his residence to his father; £5000 to Sir J. R. Carmichael; and the residue of his property, real and personal, upon trust for his father for life, and then for John Clayton.

The will (dated June 15, 1877) of the Rev. Henry Collison, late of East Bilney, Norfolk, who died on Aug. 13 last, was proved on the 11th inst. by Mrs. Harriett Mary Collison, the widow, and Albert Collison, the son, the acting executors, the value of the personal estate being upwards of £120,000. The testator gives to his wife £300 and all his furniture, jewellery, plate, household effects, horses, carriages, live and dead stock; to his nephew, Matthew Whiting, £200; to his son Albert the advowson of the consolidated rectories of East Bilney and Beetley, Norfolk, and all his freehold property in the parish of Ledgate; and to his son Henry all his freehold property in the parish of Yaxham. The remainder of his real estate is directed to be sold and the proceeds held upon trust for his wife for life, or widowhood, and then for his daughters, Harriet, Kate, and Flora. The residue of the personality is to be held upon trust, as to the income, to pay it to his wife for life or widowhood—in the event of her marrying again an annuity of £500 is substituted—and at her death or marriage again, as to the capital, for all his children, except his son Henry, who is already amply provided for.

The will (dated Nov. 9, 1867) of Mr. John Gray, formerly of Wheatfield, Bolton-le-Moors, Lancashire, but late of Claygate, Thames Ditton, Surrey, was proved on the 24th ult. by William Gray, the brother, the sole executor, the value of the personal estate being over £79,000. The testator bequeaths £500 to the Bolton Infirmary and Dispensary; £500 each to his seven godchildren; and legacies to his sister, Mrs. Slade, a cousin, and a former servant. The residue of his real and personal estate he gives to his said brother.

The will (dated Nov. 12, 1879), with a codicil (dated Feb. 10, 1881), of Mr. Edgar Disney, late of The Hyde, Ingatestone, Essex, who died on Dec. 8 last, was proved on the 17th ult. by Mrs. Barbara Disney, the widow, Frederick William Disney, the son, and William Douglas Phelps, the executors, the personal estate amounting to over £48,000. The testator leaves to his wife £1000 and all his furniture, plate, jewellery, and effects, and his mansion house for life; and annuities and legacies to children and others. The residue of his property, real and personal, is to be held upon trust for his wife for life; at her death further legacies are given to children, and the ultimate residue is to be divided between all his children, except his sons Edgar John and Lambert Brouncker, already sufficiently provided for.

The will (dated July 15, 1880) of Mr. William Ramsay, late of Bury-street, St. James's, of Brighton, and of Menie, near Aberdeen, who died on Nov. 26 last, was proved on the 7th ult. by John Ramsay, the nephew, the sole executor, the value of the personal estate exceeding £44,000. The testator, after giving legacies to nephews, friends, and servants, leaves the residue of his estate and effects to his daughters, Mrs. Jessie Knight and Ida Maude Helen, Princess Haudjeri.

The will (dated Nov. 23, 1880) of Mr. William Back, late of Bucksteep Manor, Great Bucksteep, Warbleton, Sussex, who died on Dec. 13 last, was proved on the 28th ult. by Charles Augustus Back, the son; Alfred Back, the grandson; and John Dalton, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to nearly £40,000. The testator gives legacies and annuities to daughters, sons, daughter-in-law, and workmen; £10,000 upon trust for the daughters of his late son Alfred, and the reversion to £8000 more on the death of children. One half of his real estate and of the residue of the personality he leaves to his grandson, Alfred Back; and the other half upon trust for his son, Charles Augustus, for life, and then for his said grandson.

The will (dated April 11, 1858) of Miss Mary Ann Christy, late of Coombe Bank, Kingston-on-Thames, who died on Sept. 16 last, was proved on the 24th ult. by Miss Elizabeth Christy, the sister, to whom she gives all her property, of whatever kind, for her own absolute use and benefit. The value of the personal estate exceeds £23,000.

The arrivals of live stock and fresh meat at Liverpool last week from the United States and Canada were very small, there being only one steamer with live stock and four with fresh meat, which showed a decrease in live stock and a slight increase in fresh meat. The totals were—58 cattle, 5455 qrs. of beef, and 1126 carcasses of mutton.

The annual report of the trustees of the Peabody Donation Fund has been issued. The net gain of the year, from rents and interest, has been £29,751, as shown by the annexed accounts. The sum given and bequeathed by Mr. Peabody was, in 1862, £150,000; in 1866, £100,000; in 1868, £100,000; and in 1873, £150,000; making a total of £500,000, to which has been added money received as rent and interest, £280,448, making the total fund on Dec. 31 last £780,448. The trustees have borrowed and are owing the Public Works Loan Commissioners £62,833. The expenditure to the end of the year has been £781,040. Up to the end of the year, the trustees had provided for the artisan and labouring poor of London 6160 rooms, exclusive of bath-rooms, laundries, and wash-houses. These rooms comprised 2787 separate dwellings, which were occupied by 11,459 persons. 432 new dwellings have been opened by the trustees during the past year, and for these there have been upwards of three thousand applicants.

PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.
"Paris, Nov. 4, 1878.
"I have attentively examined the beautiful pianos of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons that are exhibited at the Paris International Exhibition of 1878. I consider them to be exceptional in the case with which gradations of sound can be produced, from the softest to the most powerful tones. These excellent pianos merit the approbation of all artists, as the tone is full as well as sustained, and the touch is of perfect evenness throughout its entire range, answering to very requirement of the pianist."
"Oh, Gordon."

"I have pleasure in expressing my opinion that the Paris Exhibition Model Grand Pianos of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons are unsurpassed. The tone is deliciously sweet, sustained, and extraordinarily powerful; the touch responds to the faintest and to the most trying strains on it, and the workmanship is simply perfect."

PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.
"Illustrated London News."
"The principle of the Brinsmead firm is to give the best piano of its kind the best of materials, the best of care, the best of taste, and the best of finish, and this is why the manufacture in Kensington sends down to Wignmore-street many pianos perfect in scale, sustained in tone, elastic in bulk, with equal and responsive touch, and, in fact, as near as possible to that ideal that all musicians must require. A thing of beauty that is a joy for ever."

"In tone the instrument is exceedingly rich and sweet, and in touch the very perfection of lightness. Messrs. Brinsmead may certainly be congratulated upon their success."

"The Legion of Honour. In addition to the other distinctions awarded to Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons at the Paris Exhibition of 1878, the Commander of the firm has been created Chevalier of the Legion of Honour."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.
"Daily News."
"A new Pianoforte, recently manufactured by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, claims notice, not only on account of its beauty and richness of tone, but specially for some ingenious mechanical novelties, the most important being the addition of a third pedal, by means of which the sound of any note or notes may be almost indefinitely prolonged at the will of the player. Thus bass notes may be sustained after being struck by the left hand, which may then be taken away, and with the right hand, may execute the most brilliant staccato passages, thus giving almost the effect of four hands. The patent 'check-repeater' action, a specialty of Messrs. Brinsmead, enables the performer to command with ease the most rapid reiteration of the same note; the facility of the key movement in general being such that Ritardando passages can be executed with such perfect ease as to render them practicable with the lightest touch. The volume of tone is intensified by a peculiar construction of the sounding-board, another improvement being the system of bridging, by which the vibrations are increased and rendered sympathetic. The Pianoforte is capable of all degrees of delicacy and power, its massive structure rendering it less liable to get out of tune than usual; and the instrument is altogether calculated to extend the reputation of its makers."

DR. DE JONGH'S
(KNIGHT OF THE ORDER OF LEOPOLD OF BELGIUM, KNIGHT OF THE LEGION OF HONOUR)
LIGHT-BROWN
COD-LIVER OIL.
THE PUREST. THE MOST EFFICACIOUS.
THE MOST PALATABLE. THE MOST DIGESTIBLE.
Proved by thirty years' medical experience to be THE ONLY COD-LIVER OIL which produces the full curative effects in CONSUMPTION and DISEASES OF THE CHEST, THROAT AFFECTIONS, GENERAL DEBILITY, AND WASTING DISEASES OF CHILDREN.

SELECT MEDICAL OPINIONS.

SIR G. DUNCAN GIBB, Bart., M.D., Physician to the Westminster Hospital.
"The value of Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL as a therapeutic agent in a number of diseases, chiefly of an exhaustive character, has been admitted by the world of medicine; but, in addition, I have found it a remedy of great power in the treatment of many Affections of the Throat and Larynx, especially in Consumption of the latter, where it will sustain life when everything else fails."
DR. SINCLAIR COGHILL, Physician Royal National Hospital for Consumption, Ventnor.
"I have convinced myself that in Tubercular and the various forms of Strumous Disease, Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL possesses greater therapeutic efficacy than any other Cod-Liver Oil with which I am acquainted. It was especially noted, in a large number of cases in which the patients protested they had never been able to retain or digest other Cod-Liver Oil, that Dr. DE JONGH'S OIL was not only tolerated, but taken readily, and with marked benefit."

DR. HUNTER SEMPLE, Physician Hospital for Diseases of the Throat and Chest.
"I have long been aware of the great reputation enjoyed by the LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL introduced into medical practice by Dr. DE JONGH, and have recommended it with the utmost confidence. I have no hesitation in stating my opinion, that it possesses all the qualities of a good and efficient medicine. Its taste is by no means disagreeable, and might even be called pleasant. I have found Dr. DE JONGH'S OIL very useful in cases of Chronic Cough, and especially in Laryngeal Disease complicated with Consumption."

JOSEPH J. POPE, Esq., M.R.C.S., Late Staff Surg., Army, Prof. of Hygiene, Birkbeck Institution.

"I found during my Indian experience that the worth and character of Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL remained unchanged by tropical heat or foreign climate, and it was, from its unimpaired character, particularly adapted for long-continued administration. The value of 'hydro-carbons' in all debilitated states of the system is now becoming thoroughly recognised; and it is, without doubt, from the animal oils and fats, rather than from their vegetable substitutes, that we may hope to derive the surest benefit. The Oil of Dr. DE JONGH places in everyone's reach a reliable and valuable remedy, one that cannot be too widely recognised."

DR. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL is sold ONLY in capsules IMPERIAL Half-Pints, 2s. 6d.; Pints, 4s. 6d.; Quarts, 8s., by all respectable Chemists and Druggists throughout the World.

SPECTACLES VERSUS BLINDNESS. One-fourth of those suffering from blindness can trace their calamity to the use of common spectacles or lenses ill perfectly adapted to the sight. Mr. HENRY LAURANCE, F.R.S., Oculist Optician, PERSONALLY adapts his Improved Spectacles at his residence, 3, Endelburgh-gardens, Euston-square, daily (Sundays excepted) ten to four. Sir Julius Hensli writes:—"I have tried the principal opticians in London without success, but your Spectacles suit me admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others, is really surprising. Dr. Bird, Chelmsford, late Surgeon-Major, W.E.M. writes:—"I could not have believed it possible that my sight could have been so much improved and relieved at my age—eighty-two. I can now read the smallest print, although suffering from cataract on the right eye." Similar testimonials from John Lowe, Esq., M.D., J.E. Lynn, Physician to H.R.H. Prince of Wales; Ven. THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1882.

The National College of Music was launched at St. James's Palace on Tuesday last, under the most brilliant auspices, as was natural in respect to a movement which is not only headed by the Royal Princes, but into which they have thrown all their influence and energies. The Prince of Wales cordially accepted the responsibility of taking the initiative; and one of the most representative assemblies ever gathered together in this country promptly responded to his invitation. The address of his Royal Highness, in opening the conference, was as well suited to the occasion as it was hearty. It may be remembered that some years ago a Training School was established at South Kensington to provide scholarships for a limited period. Though it has done good work, the funds are exhausted, and in place of it a permanent National College is now projected. In other countries an institution of this character would be at once taken under the fostering wing of the State. English methods are different. The new college is to be supported by voluntary contributions, and placed under voluntary supervision. To be truly national, it will be costly, and a good example of liberality has been set by the Queen herself, followed by the Prince of Wales and the Dukes of Edinburgh, Connaught, and Albany. It is hoped that the new institution will bear the same relation to the art of music as our great schools bear to general education, and that, should it start with a hundred pupils, half of them, selected by open competition, will be maintained as well as musically trained. By a system of examination well organised, every town and village may have the opportunity of participating in the advantages of the College. It is pleasant to see the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Edinburgh so cordially throwing themselves into this enterprise. Such zeal will, we hope, be contagious. The Archbishop of Canterbury bespoke the co-operation of all ministers of religion in a work which might be of spiritual service, and tend to heal ecclesiastical divisions; and the Prime Minister, referring to the revolution that has taken place in musical taste in England during the last half century, spoke of the movement as peculiarly opportune. An excellent beginning was made on Tuesday. But large endowments, perhaps not less than a quarter of a million sterling, will be needed to place the College on a firm foundation, and we have every confidence that a scheme which appeals to all sections of the community, and which is adapted to develop, and give practical expression to, the musical tastes of Englishmen, will meet with prompt and munificent support. Devised by members of the Royal family, to whom the progress of musical culture has long been a personal as well as a national question, and supported by all that is representative amongst us, the Royal College of Music will, we doubt not, achieve the success which it unquestionably deserves.

The realisation of the Channel Tunnel has become one of the great questions—perhaps we should say the most warmly discussed problem—of the day. So much progress has already been made with this stupendous engineering undertaking that it is the fashion for Sir Edward Watkin and his South-Eastern Railway colleagues to organise select parties to inspect the progress of the subterranean works at Shakspeare's Cliff; and it is equally the fashion for daily papers and monthly magazines to set forth the advantages or point out the drawbacks of this international enterprise. But, inasmuch as successive Governments have accorded a provisional sanction to the gigantic Tunnel, the question for consideration is, rather, the best means of preventing it from becoming a point d'appui for the invasion of our sea-girt island, than of deciding whether it shall be carried out. The whole question has been wisely remitted by the Government to a Commission of experts, whose report will be awaited with great interest. Much may be said on both sides, and it is only natural that there should be a wide divergence of military and naval opinion. Those who aver that the safeguards against a buccaneering expedition from the Continent are, or may be made, perfectly impregnable, have much reason on their side. There is hardly a question that the English end of the tunnel might be secured against the possibility of a sudden surprise from a treacherous enemy. Whether we should be entirely free from panics is more doubtful. But it is not very extravagant to assume that the increase of intercourse, and the strengthening of international interests, will minimise, if not extinguish, international distrust and animosity, and herein we may find a better safeguard of our national independence than in costly fortifications.

It is more easy to take up a wrong position than to withdraw from it. Such may have been the reflection of the Peers who, moved by the clamour of Irish landlords, proposed a Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the Land Act only four months after it had got into working order. It is certainly the conclusion of impartial observers not influenced by strong party prejudices, and who can see no other object in such an inquiry than an unprecedented and unseemly attempt to emasculate a legislative enactment to which those who now turn upon it were consenting parties. The objections urged against the decision of the House of Peers by Lord Lansdowne, who has seceded from the present Government, and of Lord Derby, who has refrained from joining them, were quite unanswerable. For the sake of the great public interests at stake, and even of the prospects of his party, it is to be regretted that Lord Salisbury, instead of accepting the olive-branch held out by Lord Granville on Friday last, resolved on courting a conflict with the House of Commons, on the slender pretext that the Prime Minister had decided to give no countenance whatever to a proposal which, he declares, would paralyse the hands of the Executive at a time when Ireland is in a state of veiled rebellion.

The events of Monday showed that the Conservatives have made a fatal tactical blunder, all the more gratuitous because conciliatory overtures had been made by the Government and rejected. It was perfectly natural that the Irish Inreconcilables, whose avowed aim is the destruction of Irish landlordism, should join with the Opposition in an attempt to frustrate the quiet working of the Land Act, which stands between them and their object. But a statesman of Sir Stafford Northcote's sobriety must have been greatly mortified to find himself defeated by so great a majority as 133 in his unusual attempt to prevent the suspension of the standing orders with a view to thwart a Minister of the Crown in proposing a resolution. His misgiving as to the course he was pursuing must have been still more lively when he saw so staunch a Conservative as the venerable Mr. Walpole fling off into the opposite lobby, and two of the followers of Mr. Parnell acting as tellers on behalf of the great Conservative party—the bitter foes of the Irish landlords taking the lead of their friends. Never was there a more complete turning of the tables. On Monday morning the public were led to expect the retirement of Mr. Gladstone, a Ministerial crisis, or even a hasty dissolution; in the evening the Prime Minister, backed by a majority of two to one, rebukes the House of Lords, and shatters to pieces an unnatural coalition. With a moderation which has surprised his political foes, Mr. Gladstone has left open the door for an arrangement which would save the amour propre of the territorial peers, while it would deprive them of the opportunity of destroying the Irish Land Act. The Hereditary Chamber has often returned to a safe path when similar political crises have occurred. Must we, in this instance, despair of its discretion when the Prime Minister, backed by the Representative Chamber, solemnly declares that her Majesty's Ministers will not be responsible "for the results upon the mind and temper of the Irish people of allowing it to be supposed, even for forty-eight hours, that the Government and the House of Commons are content with the deplorable and ill-omened measure" that has been adopted against an Act of Parliament that is intended "to put an end to an odious war of classes, and to build firmly and deeply the foundations of social order." Probably not, if the reports of their willingness to limit the scope of the Select Committee are correct.

The sensation created throughout Europe by the incendiary utterances of General Skobelev has greatly abated. That outspoken military officer has been recalled by his Imperial master, and is returning to St. Petersburg by the circuitous route of Geneva and Munich rather than Berlin, where he would hardly be a welcome guest. Whether this indiscreet Panslavist is to be interned in his own house, or sent to command a corps at Minsk, is not quite clear. There is, however, adequate evidence that while in Paris he made little progress in winning over responsible French statesmen to a contingent alliance with Russia, and that Prince Bismarck has taken his attack on Germany with serene composure. But although the preservation of peace is the uppermost thought of the great Chancellor and the Emperor William, the European situation is not free from peril as long as the struggle in Bosnia and Herzegovina continues. Austria continues to mass large bodies of troops in these rebellious provinces, but severe weather impedes military operations. Servian sympathy, the benevolent neutrality of the Montenegrins, and, above all, the Russian volunteers, who are streaming southward, will tend to encourage the insurgents, and may bring about serious complications. Distrustful of Austrian designs and Bulgarian aspirations, the Porte is preparing to concentrate a large force in the neighbourhood of Novi-Bazar. But no serious conflagration need be feared in Eastern Europe so long as the Czar adheres to his recent pacific declarations, and General Ignatieff is not allowed to supersede M. de Giers at the Russian Foreign Office.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

Mr. F. Treves, F.R.C.S., of the London Hospital, is entitled to the applause and gratitude of all persons of common sense for the admirable lecture which, at the Townhall, Kensington, on Saturday afternoon last, he delivered on the folly and the unhealthiness of modern feminine apparel. The address was given under the auspices of the National Health Society; and it seemed to please so much a crowded audience, composed almost entirely of ladies, that, for the benefit of those "grandes dames de par le monde" who had been unable through lack of space to obtain admission to the hall, Mr. Ernest Hart announced, on the part of the committee, that the lecture would be repeated on the Eighteenth instant.

There are only two portions of Mr. Treves's address to which it is desirable, in this place at least, to call attention. The first is the lecturer's elaborate attack on that extraordinary "arrangement in absurdity," as Mr. J. M. Whistler might call it, the modern ball or dinner dress; the next is Mr. Treves's righteous denunciation of tightly-laced stays. With regard to the evening costume of ladies, the sumptuary censor of the Kensington Townhall cogently pointed out that ladies—or rather their dressmakers—systematically neglected to pay attention to the requirements of an equable temperature in apparel; that the neck, the arms, and a considerable portion of the thorax were generally left wholly uncovered; while the "region of the corset" was reasonably protected and the lower extremities were smothered in uncomfortable masses of superabundant skirts. In particular did Mr. Treves object to the accumulation of successive "layers" of drapery in the "region" of the hips.

With regard to "equable temperature," it may be deferentially observed that the temperature of ball-rooms and dining-rooms is generally a very high one, and that if the guests were uniformly clad in warm garments their sufferings would be intense. Does Mr. Treves expect a lady to sit down to table or to stand up in a waltz in a fur cape, an ulster, Balmoral hosiery, and thick-soled boots? Are the male guests to appear in pea-jackets buttoning up to the throat, Inverness capes, and worsted comforters? We "wrap up" when we leave the Halls of Dazzling Light, and not while we are in them. Did Mr. Treves, I wonder, ever go to a ball at St. Petersburg or Moscow in winter time? He would see, in the vestibule, the lady and gentlemen invités arriving in the guise of so many huge bales of fur, permitting only the tips of their noses and of their indiarubber goloshes-covered toes to be visible to the naked eye; while their heads were surmounted by enormous "busbies" of sable, beaver, Astracan, or sealskin. But as soon as they were disrobed of their shoubas and their kalpats the ladies would stand revealed in décolletés and diaphanous corsages, and flowing trains, and the gentlemen in full military uniforms (in which they usually feel much too hot) or else in the cooler albeit idiotic costume of waiters, undertakers, and civilians in evening dress, all over the world.

Mem.: In one particular the ladies are not so neglectful of preserving an "equable temperature" in their raiment as Mr. Treves would have us imagine. When they go to the theatre (our dramatic establishments are, as a rule, either too hot or too cold) they wear sensibly warm "opera-cloaks," which are often not only very comfortable, but splendidly decorative. I notice in the March number of "The Ladies' Gazette of Fashion" a mantle for evening wear cut in downright ulster, or what the French call "coachmann" fashion, composed apparently of cherry coloured satin, with a stand-up-collar, upper cape, and border of rich fur, with which the garment is probably lined. A delicious "Upper Benjamin"—a most elegant "wrap rascal!"

Against Mr. Treves's strictures on the abominable practice of excessive lacing, and of the frightful train of maladies which that practice encourages, there is not, from the common-sense point of view, one word to be said. But common-sense has nothing whatever to do with corsets. Stays have been wrathfully denounced, and merrily ridiculed for ages and ages. Hear Clement Marot, writing in 1514 of "La Jolie Parisienne":

Elle vous avoit un corset
D'un fin bleu, lacé d'un lacet
Jaune, qu'elle avoit fait exprès
Mancherons d'escarlatte verte
Robe de pers large et ouverte.

The "Jolie Parisienne" also wore "linge blanc, ceinture houpée" (was the "houpe" or tuft; see Riquet à la Houppe) a "dress improver?"), "chaperon fait en poupée," "chausses noires et petits patins." Black stockings, you see, were fashionable in 1514. Thirty years ago black stockings were worn only by charity girls and servants of all work in lodging-houses.

All that Mr. Treves had to say against suffocation and strangulation by means of tightly laced stays has been said five hundred times before by innumerable essayists, satirists, and medical men. Before me as I write this lies a work on "Deformities of the Spine and Chest," by Mr. Charles Rogers Harrison, M.R.C.S., and published by J. Churchill in the year 1842, just forty years ago. Mr. Harrison quotes a multitude of high medical authorities of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, beginning with Camper and Morgagni, and ending with Müller and Winslow, against the "wasp" and "hour-glass" waist; and he enumerates no less than seventy-eight distinct ailments, beginning with headache and hysteria, and ending with paralysis and atrophy, all directly the result of tight lacing. I have a whole shelf full of books on curvature of the spine, full of appalling engravings of compressed ribs, depressed breast-bones and distorted vertebra; and in the present year of grace 1882 the ladies are lacing more tightly than ever; and, to my humble thinking, they no more intend to give up tight-lacing (till the fashion changes) than politicians intend to substitute the Shakspearian word "Closure" for the French "Clôture" (pronounced "Clottoor").

I note a French word which has been giving me a good deal of trouble this week, in a very curious and entertaining volume just published by Messrs. Chatto and Windus, "Chap-Books of the Eighteenth Century," with facsimiles, notes, and introduction, by John Ashton. The reproduced old wood blocks seem, in many instances, to belong to the seventeenth century. "Captain James Hind," for example, whose "Merry Life and Mad Exploits" are narrated, is attired like a Cavalier in the reign of Charles I. Many old familiar friends turn up among the chap-books disinterred by painstaking and appreciative Mr. James Ashton. We renew our acquaintance with the "Wandering Jew," "Bateman's Tragedy," "The Portsmouth Ghost," "Nixon's Cheshire Prophecy," the "History of Adam Bell, Clim of the Clough, and William of Cloudslee," "The Lawyer's Doom," and "The Drunkard's Legacy," which some may better remember as "The Heir of Lynn." Students of our penal statutes will be interested (and shocked) by the account of Christian Bowman, alias Bowman (a woman) "who was burnt at a stake in the Old Bailey on Wednesday, the 18th of March, 1789, for High Treason in feloniously and traitorously counterfeiting the silver coin of this realm. Christian Bowman (she was mercifully strangled before the flames reached her) was the last woman judicially burned in England.

But the French word which so puzzled me I find at page 423 of Mr. Ashton's book, under the head of "A Choice Collection of Cookery Receipts."

Take a quarter of a pint of Claret and as much Water; some Grated Bread, two or three heads of Rocumbile, a little whole Pepper, Mace, sliced Nutmeg, and Salt. Let this stew very well over the Fire; then beat it up with Butter, and pour it under the Wild Fowl, which being under-roasted will afford Gravy to mix with this Sauce.

Not at all a bad sauce for a woodcock, as sauces go; but do any modern cooks, I wonder, ever use "rocumbile" as a flavouring? Has one English professed cook out of twenty ever heard of "rocumbile"? Obviously, it is the French word "rocamboule." The small wild sweet Spanish garlic, "especie de ajo dulce," as it is defined in M. de Séjourant's great "Dictionnaire Français-Espagnol." "Chives, shallots, and rocamboule," writes Dr. Lindlay in "The Vegetable Kingdom," p. 203, "are other species of the Alliaceous race." This is all very well; but why should "rocamboule" (as I learn from Cassell's Anglo-French Dictionary) likewise signify in French "a trite poor joke, the piquancy or point of an occurrence"? Most people have heard of a French novel called "La Résurrection de Rocamboule," and of "Maman Rocamboule." What connection is there between the names of these equivocal personages and wild garlic?

Only five years after that miserable woman of whom I spoke just now was burnt at Newgate there was born, at the west end of London, an infant who was christened Katherine. The baby Kate became in process of time the famous English singer, "Kitty Stephens," who so delighted Hazlitt and Leigh Hunt, and who extorted smiling admiration even from the stern and moody Macready. Miss Stephens became, in 1838, the spouse of the Fifth Earl of Essex, who died the following year; and his noble relict survived him until only the other day, when the Dowager Countess of Essex passed away, at the great age of eighty-eight. Her remains were interred on Tuesday last in Kensal Green Cemetery.

It may be simply said of the late Countess Dowager of Essex, as, happily, it may likewise be said of other charming English singers of whom the nation are proud—of Miss Paton, of Madame Clara Novello, of Miss Rainsforth, of Miss Romer, of Miss Birch, of Miss Dolby, of Miss Poole, of Miss Lucombe, of Miss P. Horton (needless to give their married names)—that she was emphatically a Good Woman, and that her voice was as pure as her fame. The "Good Woman" in the old tavern signs was pictured without a head (some malicious reference, I presume, to the feminine tongue); but "Kitty" Stephens had a very shapely head and a pretty face; and my mother, who knew her very well, often told me that Miss Stephens's head was painted by Harlow as that of one of the maids of honour in the picture of the Trial Scene in Henry VIII., which is at this present writing one of the attractions of the Exhibition of the Works of the Old Masters at the Royal Academy. The picture, as we probably all know, also contains portraits of the Kemble family: John Kemble as Cardinal Wolsey; Charles Kemble as Cromwell; Stephen Kemble as Henry VIII.; and the unapproachable Sarah Siddons as Queen Katharine.

More than once has it been printed that there is no "Poet's Corner" in the "Echoes," and the hint may have had one beneficial effect in saving the distressed compiler of the page in question from being overwhelmed by avalanches of poetical manuscript. Still, it may be permissible to quote now and again a rare bit of printed verse. I cite one from the San Francisco News Letter:

'Twas more than a million years ago,
Or so it seems to me,
That I used to prance around and beam
The beautiful Annabel Lee.
There were other girls in the neighborhood,
But none was a patch to she.
And this was the reason that long ago
My love fell out of a tree,
And busted herself on a cruel rock;
A solemn sight to see.
For it spoiled the hat and gown and looks
Of the beautiful Annabel Lee.
We loved with a love that was lovely love,
I and my Annabel Lee,
And we went one day to gather the nuts
That men call hickoree—
And I stayed below in the rosy glow
While she shinned up the tree;
But no sooner up than down kerslap
Came the beautiful Annabel Lee.

Apart from the humour of the poem (I have not quoted the concluding stanza) three curious Americanisms may be noticed. "Busted," in the second stanza; "shinned up the tree" and coming down "kerslap" in stanza the third.

"Shinning" is used in the States to express the act of walking as well as of climbing. "He was always shinning around the free lunches;" that is to say, "he was always prowling from restaurant to restaurant, where gratuitous luncheons were served."

As to the etymology of "kerslap," I am in the dark. My Bartlett's "Dictionary of Americanisms" I lent to a friend; and, the Greek Kalends not having yet arrived, he has not yet returned it. But I am the happy owner of a volume, entitled "Americanisms: the English of the New World," by Dr. Schele De Vere, Professor of Modern Languages in the University of Virginia. In Dr. De Vere's book I find "kerchunk" defined as an odd expletive which may be in some vague way associated with the noise caused by the sudden falling of a "chunk" or clod of earth: a corruption of the old English "clump." Then there is "kershaw," the Western name for a pumpkin, which Dr. De Vere thinks may possibly be a corruption of an Indian name—"though the relations to squash is nearer." Finally, there is "kerswosh," which occurs in his Excellency the American Minister's line—

They
Would all come down kerswosh! ex tho' the dam broke into a river.

Mem.: The English equivalent for to come down "kerchunk," "kerswosh," and "kerslap" is, of course, to come down "souse." But how fashions change in the use of words! To "come down souze" (the French "tomber sus") is a thoroughly legitimate English expression. It is defined in the most modern dictionaries as an adverb "with sudden descent and violence, plumply, directly." Yet have I not the slightest doubt that were I to write in a leading article, "Mr. Gladstone came down souze on Sir Stafford Northcote" (or vice versa), my judicious editor would expunge the word "souze" as a vulgarity; unless, indeed, he preserved a vivid remembrance of a remarkable passage in a speech delivered in the House of Commons by Edmund Burke:—

How comes this Junius to have broken through the cobwebs of the law, and to range uncontrolled, unpunished through the land. . . . In these respects the North Briton is as much inferior to him as in strength, wit, and judgment. But while I expected in this daring flight his final ruin and fall, behold him rising still higher, and coming down souze on both Houses of Parliament.

I read in the papers that a gallant Colonel of Engineers and another gentleman are about to try to cross the Channel in a balloon. They may have crossed it ere this paragraph is published. I learn that they have visited Canterbury, "and completed their arrangements" for their aerial trip to France. An arrangement has been made with a gas company for the supply of 57,000 feet of gas for inflating the india-rubber balloon, and for other purposes. The start was to be attempted on Thursday, the Second of March; "but an unfavourable position of the wind might cause delay." Of course it might. A balloon is utterly and entirely at the mercy of the wind, which bloweth where it listeth. No means have yet been discovered of steering or navigating an aerial machine; and under these circumstances I am emboldened to ask Mr. Henry Coxwell, or some other really practical aeronaut, what practical purpose can possibly be served by a balloon trip to France.

Almost an "embarras de richesse" has been my fortune in the matter of the expression "blood-guiltiness," which Mr. Gladstone was accused of having "coined." From the multitude of communications which have reached me touching a not uninteresting episode in the history of words (since we have been able to dig "bloodguilty" out of Spenser's "Faerie Queene," and out of Fairfax's "Tasso") I am only able this week to quote: "E. M. Q.," who kindly tells me (1) that the collateral texts of the versions of the Vulgate by Wycliffe and his followers (Oxford, 1850) give, in the earlier version, the passage in the Fifty-First Psalm thus:—"Deliuere me fro blodis;" and in the later version, "Deliuere me fro bloodis;" These are literal translations from the Latin: "Libera me de sanguinibus." (2) My correspondent further furnishes me with the passage in Greek from the Septuagint version and with the Hebrew text; but with the fear of the compositors before my eyes I must eschew transcriptions from the more recondite tongues. But I cannot resist quoting from a French version of the Vulgate (Paris, 1730), by Le Maître de Saci. "Délivrez moi;" here follows a curiously casuistical interpolation, "de tout de sang que j'ai répandu"—from all the blood that I have spilt!

A correspondent, whose letter I have mislaid, but whose communication is couched in polyglot diction and in jocular style, asks if there be any English translation of the "Teatro Critico Universal" and the other bulky and erudite works of Don F. Benito Geronimo Feyjoo y Montenegro, Master-General of the Order of St. Benedict in Spain and Counsellor of his Majesty. I know of no such translation of the writings of Don Benito. He was the Spanish Bayle—but a Romanist one; and Carlyle, I fear, might have denounced his ceaseless literary activity as "eternal scribble." He discoursed learnedly on astrology, eclipses, medical paradoxes, vulgar errors, miracles, "la portentosa porosidad de los cuerpos," premature interment, demoniacal incubi, the transfusion of blood, the "providencias economicas" of tobacco and chocolate, and of the "Anticipated Production of a Perfect Child."

It was quite by an accident that I became, a long time ago, the possessor of the works of Don Benito Feyjoo y Montenegro. I wanted some "upper-shelf" books. You know what "upper-shelf" books are—Works of Jean Jacques Rousseau, thirty-five volumes; "Voyages and Travels;" Rees's Cyclopædia; the European Magazine; and so forth—books, in fine, which you do not read every day; nor, for the matter of that, every week, nor month, nor year. The bookseller to whom I applied had some difficulty in finding some "upper shelves" or "fill-ups" ready to his hand—reputable, decently-bound volumes, at moderate prices. Suddenly he asked, "Would you like a Feyjoo?" "A what?" I returned. The bibliophile pronounced the name as though it rhymed with "Taboo." But he brought his Feyjoo forward, and I looked into Don Benito; and when I got him home I gleefully found that there was much "meat" on the rare old Benedictine—notably in the "Cartas Eruditas y Curiosas."

THE ROYAL AVENUE THEATRE.

This new theatre, which will be opened by its proprietor, Mr. Sefton Parry, on the 11th inst., is situated at the bottom of Northumberland Avenue, its front extending 160 ft. from Craven-street to the Thames Embankment, and forming a bold curve, at two thirds that length from above, facing towards Westminster Bridge. The back of the theatre is close against the Charing-cross Railway Station. The elevation, of Portland stone, is in the French Renaissance style, with some ornamental carving, and with a number of statues, including Shakespeare, between Comedy and Tragedy, over the principal entrance; the sculptor is Mr. Flows, of Brixton. The principal entrance to the dress circle and stalls is on the curve of the front; to the right of this, as you face the building, are the pit and gallery entrances, on the Victoria Embankment; while to the left, in the direction of Craven-street, are windows, and a private entrance to the Prince of Wales's box, and the stage entrance is in Craven-street. With regard to the interior, the dimensions of the auditorium are 65 ft. by 52 ft.; and the stage is 52 ft. broad, and 32 ft. deep, from front to back. The orchestra is large enough to accommodate thirty performers. There are six rows of stalls, and a pit behind which holds three hundred people; one tier of dress circle boxes, above the pit; amphitheatre stalls and amphitheatre, over the dress circle; and private boxes on each side, with large proscenium boxes, giving accommodation for 1200 or 1300 people altogether. The dressing-rooms are under the auditorium, in the basement, which has been carried down 40 ft. The main floor of the house is fire-proof, as well as the staircases, corridors, and saloons; and the passages, staircases, and exits have been arranged strictly in accordance with the latest regulations and by-laws of the Metropolitan Board of Works. The architects of the theatre are Messrs. Fowler and Hill, of Serjeants' Inn; the contractors were Messrs. Kirk and Randall, of Woolwich. The internal decorations, of French character, are in carton-pierre, by Mr. Doebinder; their colour ivory and gold. Around the ceiling are medallion portraits of famous dramatic poets of all nations. The lighting is by a handsome glass chandelier in the middle of the house. The drapery, curtains and seats, are of red damask. The Royal Avenue Theatre will open with a revival of Offenbach's "Madame Favart."

THE PLAYHOUSES.

The "Æsthetic Quadrille," which created such a furor during the last nights of the Covent Garden pantomime, and was first performed before the Prince and Princess of Wales, has been transplanted, with complete success and nightly-increasing attractiveness, to the Britannia—the "Great Theatre," Hoxton—and to the Opéra Comique. To the last-named theatre I went on Tuesday to see the "Æsthetic" gloss on the Code of Terpsichore as invented by Mr. Alfred Gibbons, arranged by Mr. Alfred Dewinne, and performed by Messrs. Julian Girard, Frederick Girard, Victor Girard, Marius Girard, and Mdlles. Alice Holt, Harriette Lauri, Emily Allcroft, and Mdlle. Rosa. The costumes worn by these nimble funambulists and la'érine are, to begin with, wonderful. The dresses of the gentlemen seem to be a combination of the "Bunthorne's Bride" wardrobe, and the mediæval garb depicted by Sandro Botticelli, Andrea Mantegna, and Cesare Vecellio. The appearance of the ladies it might be invidious to particularise; for just as the ploughboy, who was directed to count a herd of pigs, declared that "there was one little pig ran about so that he could not count him"; so did the charming lady dancers in the "Æsthetic Quadrille" present such a generally kaleidoscopic, chameleon-like, and Protean aspect that I could not well make out whether it was Miss Alice Holt who had been suddenly transformed into Miss Harriette Lauri, or whether Miss Emily Allcroft was really Miss Allcroft herself, or Mdlle. Rosa. Speaking broadly, however, it struck me that one fair choreographer looked like Canova's Dancing Girl in a pink sacque, another like the Huntress Diana in a "tea-gown," a third like the Cumæan Sybil under the influence of zedone, and a fourth like Miss Ellen Terry as Camma gone mad. The ladies all carried immense fans, and the gentlemen Japanese parasols. This extraordinary "octet" went through a number of astonishing attitudes. The Girards put their legs over other people's shoulders, and the tips of their toes into their own eyes, and "jumped over themselves," so to speak. The ladies turned and twisted and pranced and languished, and periodically they all "flopped" prone to the stage. They managed to get up again very gracefully, and leaped, capered, languished, and "flopped" de novo. Of course, they were rapturously applauded during this phenomenally agile, and—for all its madcap wildness—symmetrical performance. They were, I may incidentally remark, much more "Æsthetic" than probably they themselves thought. When I came home I asked myself where I had seen something approximating to these fantastic postures, to these strange, weird, but not uncouth antics. I reached down my Montfaucon, my Agincourt, and my Krause's "Gymnastik und Agonistik der Hellenen." I arrived at length at the conclusion that the "Æsthetic Quadrille" bore no slight resemblance to an ancient bas-relief of a "rally" of Bacchanals made mobile and translated into brilliant colour. Dancing has been defined as the "poetry of motion." The Æsthetic Quadrille may be defined as "the hysteria of dancing;" and the Bacchantes were clearly hysterical.

The amiable and accomplished Miss Litton and the youthful and ardent Mr. Kyle Bellew having happily recovered from the alarming accident which befell them the other night during the performance at the Globe Theatre—a surgical appliance on the lower part of Mr. Kyle Bellew's visage still, however, pointing to his recent mishap—the two excellent artists in question have been able to resume their parts in Messrs. Paul Meritt and George Conquest's "sensational domestic drama," in seven acts, entitled "Mankind; or, Beggar Your Neighbour." The story of this capital play simply bears out its frankly-cynical title. Twenty characters are scheduled in a rather pedantically formulated list of the dramatis personæ, which is made out as though it were a census paper, or a proposal for a life assurance policy. The list comprises one "loyal," one "respectable," one "cheeky," one "breezy," one "meek," one "busy," one "trustful," one "simple," one "loving," and one "reliable" (odious word!) personage; the rest of "Mankind" at the Globe are "out-and-out" rascals, being respectively described as "grasping," "bumptious," "remorseless," "cool," "pugnacious," "cruel," and "lunabugging." I would rather not attempt to analyse the plot of "Mankind"—that way madness would lie. Messrs. Paul Meritt and George Conquest are skilled dramatic chefs in the melodramatic line; and they have, in this most interesting and exciting play, which never hangs fire for a minute, concocted a kind of sensational bouillabaisse, containing all kinds of strange fishes. The recipe for this ingenious medley might run practically thus. Take a Witch's Cauldron and set it over a blue fire. Strangle a disreputable junior partner of a money-lender and throw into the pot. Hang the other money-lender for murdering his colleague and throw him in, likewise. Half-drown a virtuous young married lady and in with her. Beat a small clever child in black stockings very hard to make her tender and pop her in. Make a merciless villain blow out his worthless brains and fling him in. Add a cup of coffee well poisoned. Flavour with a stolen will, a Chubb's burglar-proof safe, several forgeries, a good deal of genial humour, an old woman's gingham umbrella, some seaweed from Ramsgate Sands, some gravel from a garden on the Thames Embankment, a rasher of bacon from a coffee-tavern, a quartern of gin, a "Gladstone" bag, a small quantity of blood, a pinch of gunpowder, and any amount of vigorous acting, and then you have your bouillabaisse—your "Mankind." Make the gruel very thick and slab; et servez, chaud. I had been told that the play of Messrs. Meritt and Conquest was too "transpontine" in its colour; but I hold that the Trans-tvere of London must be a very fortunate district if dramas so good as "Mankind" are often produced there. The play ought to "draw" as "Taken from Life" is drawing at the Adelphi and "The Lights o' London" at the Princess's. The acting in "Mankind" is excellent. Nothing could be more artistic than Mr. George Conquest's "make up" as the horrible old usurer Groodge, nor more powerful than his rendering of the part. Miss Litton was irresistibly fascinating, and full of quiet, heartfelt pathos, as the ill-used wife, Mrs. Maitland; and Mr. Kyle Bellew's impersonation of the gallant Philip Warren was chivalrous in bearing and eloquent in diction. The fair-haired graceful little girl in sable hose, Miss Katie Barry, who played Mrs. Maitland's ca' gliter, acquitted herself to admiration, and seems to me to have a claim to the making of a first-rate actress in her; and Mr. John G. Wilton and Miss Harriet Claremont as a pugnacious costermonger and his bouncing wife were exceedingly racy and amusing. Mr. J. G. Wilton must also be congratulated on his strict attention to the requirements of realism in his costume as a "coster." His corduroy "kicksies," with the "artful fakement" at the bottom, are in strictest accordance with the "æsthetic" traditions of the "Cut." Messrs. J. A. Rosier, Frank Huntley, Lizzie Claremont (the old woman with the umbrella), and Miss Goldway (the adored one of the chivalrous Philip Warren) were also very good. I hope that "Mankind" will have a long run, and bring plenty of money to the Globe Theatre.

More new theatres! Two or three are, I hear, in actual course of construction, one or two more are in embryo; and another is now completely built, decorated, swept, garnished, and furnished. The new dramatic temple to which I allude is the Royal Avenue Theatre, on Northumberland-avenue, which, in a very few days, will be opened, under the management of the popular M. Marius, with the always fascinating opera-bouffe, by Offenbach, "Madame Favart." I have had the advantage of making a narrow inspection of the Avenue Theatre, which strikes me as being, considering its dimensions, one of the handsomest, tastefullest, most comfortable and safest theatres that I have ever visited. And I have seen most of the theatres of the civilised world. The architect of the new theatre is Mr. F. Fowler, of the firm of Fowler and Hill; the lessee is Mr. Edmund Burke; the manager, as I have said, the vivacious French artiste, M. Marius; and the proprietor of the theatre, under whose immediate personal supervision the whole of the work has been carried out, is Mr. Sefton Parry, who has already, I believe, taken the leading part in building some eight theatres in London and the provinces. The building is in the richest and purest style of the French Renaissance, and the decoration of the interior is especially beautiful; the circular ceiling of the auditorium being divided into twelve compartments, containing as many "cartouche" portraits of famous dramatic writers of all countries and all ages—from Shakespeare and Molière to Goldsmith and Beaumarchais. These portraits are elaborately painted, and may be called real works of art. The plastic decorations, in carton-pierre, modelled and supplied by Mr. Boekbinder, are eminently luxurious and tasteful; the statuary, with which the interior is liberally embellished, is graceful and refined; and—most important features, perhaps, of all—the means of egress are many and easy of access; the vestibules and corridors are roomy and commodious; there will be no locks to any of the doors, which open outward; the pit and stalls are nearly on a level with the street, and the entire structure is fire-proof.

This instant Saturday afternoon will take place at the Lyceum the last performance, for this season at least, of Mr. Albery's comedy of "Two Roses," of which Mr. Henry Irving as Mr. Digby Grant, and Mr. David James as "Our Mr. Jenkins," have endowed us with such delightful reminiscences. The theatre is to be closed on Saturday evening, and on the evenings of Monday and Tuesday; when it may be presumed that the last rehearsals will be held and the last finishing touches given to the accessories of a momentous performance. Wednesday, the eighth instant, will be marked by an event which will probably be the most important in the dramatic season of 1882. On the evening in question will be produced, for the first time under Mr. Irving's management at the Lyceum, Shakespeare's tragedy of "Romeo and Juliet," which for a long time has been the subject of the most earnest study and preparation on the part of the accomplished manager and his company, and on the production of which almost unprecedented scenic, decorative, and sumptuary splendour will be lavished. The "cast," in addition to Mr. Henry Irving as Romeo and Miss Ellen Terry as Juliet, will include Mrs. Stirling, Mr. James Fernandez, Mr. Howe, and Mr. Terriss. The music incidental to the tragedy has been composed specially for the occasion by Sir Julius Benedict; and the costumes have been designed by Mr. Alfred Thompson.

MUSIC.

Of the Carl Rosa Opera Company's performances at Her Majesty's Theatre there is nothing special to say; repetitions of works recently noticed having prevailed since our last record. For Wednesday evening "Il Trovatore" was announced, for the only time this season, and this (Saturday) afternoon Wagner's "Rienzi" is to be given.—A new series of performances of operas in English by members of the Carl Rosa company begins this evening with the "Bohemian Girl."

The Philharmonic Concert of last week—the second of the seventieth season—included the first performance in England of one of Franz Liszt's twelve "Symphonische Dichtungen" ("Symphonic Poems"), that entitled "Hungaria." Most of these pieces had previously been heard in this country, and have been commented on by us. That now referred to contains some few passages in which the peculiar rhythm of Hungarian music is agreeably reflected, or copied; but the greater portion of the work is in that inflated and exaggerated style, with those violent and spasmodic contrasts which characterise Liszt's larger productions and preclude them from being considered as compositions, properly so-called, being rather the eccentric outpourings of ill-regulated musical thought that is demonstrative rather than reflective, and utterly defiant of all coherence, or of any amenableness to classical precedent. The other orchestral pieces at the concert referred to—Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture—were eminently welcome, from the force of contrast. Herr Scharwenka played Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A minor with success, but with an occasional exaggeration of energy, his powers having been better exemplified in unaccompanied solos of his own composition, and by Mendelssohn and Chopin. Madame Marie Roze sang with much expression Gluck's "Divinités du Styx" and Berlioz's "Absence," and Madame Trebelli gave, with fine voice and style, Mozart's "Voi che sapete," and Rossini's "Ah! quel giorno." Mr. W. G. Cousins conducted ably.

At the Sacred Harmonic Society's concert of yesterday (Friday) week a new "Te Deum," composed by Mr. W. G. Cousins, was performed for the first time, conducted by the composer. It contains some effective writing, especially in the closing fugue movement, "O Lord, in Thee have I trusted." The tone of the work as a whole, however, is somewhat incongruous in the mixture of the sacred and secular styles. It was generally well rendered, with the exception of a misunderstanding on the part of some of the chorists during a few bars of the movement, "We believe that Thou shalt come." The "Te Deum" was preceded by Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, and followed by Mr. Arthur Sullivan's sacred musical drama, "The Martyr of Antioch," both which were conducted by Mr. Sinton, who replaces Sir Michael Costa during this gentleman's illness. The solo vocalists in the psalm were Mrs. Suter (in consequence of the non-arrival of Miss Beebe) and Messrs. Carter, Beckett, F. King, and H. Cross. In the "Te Deum" the soloists were Miss Beebe, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. F. King; these two gentlemen, Miss A. Marriot, and Madame Patey having given great effect to the solo music in Mr. Sullivan's work. Mrs. Suter's ready efficiency, in a sudden emergency, deserves special recognition.

Mr. W. Macfarren gave the first of his series of orchestral concerts at St. James's Hall last Saturday evening, when a well-selected band played, with fine effect, his overture to Shakespeare's "King Henry the Fifth," those to Weber's "Oberon" and Mozart's "Zauberflöte," and Beethoven's symphony in C minor. Miss M. Gyde gave a very artistic rendering of Mr. W. Macfarren's "Concert-stick" for pianoforte, with orchestra, and M. Sinton played Mendelssohn's violin concerto with skilful execution. Vocal pieces were contributed by Miss M. Davies and Mr. Santley. Mr. W. Macfarren conducted ably.

Herr Joachim made his second appearance at the Popular Concert of last Saturday afternoon, and his third at that of Monday evening. He will continue to be the leading violinist until the end of the season. Much interest is felt in the reappearance of Madame Schumann next Monday, when the great pianist will assuredly receive an enthusiastic welcome.

The Matinée Musicale given at Steinway Hall last week by MM. Ferdinand and Hermann Carri, displayed the high technical skill of each, of the former as a solo violinist in pieces by Paganini and Ernst, and of the latter in solos by Liszt, Chopin, and other composers, both artists having been associated in sonatas by Gade and Rubinstein.

The fourth of Mr. Sims Reeves's concerts of operatic, national, and miscellaneous music—at St. James's Hall—took place on Tuesday evening, when the programme included effective vocal performances by Madame Trebelli, Misses Santley, S. Jones, and C. Elliott, Mr. Santley, and Mr. H. Reeves; and the skilful playing of the "Anemoie Union," directed by Mr. Lazarus. Mr. Sims Reeves was prevented from appearing, in consequence of a sudden attack of hoarseness and sore throat. The last concert of the series—previous to Mr. Reeves resuming his farewell tour in the provinces—is announced for March 21.

The second of Mr. Henry Holmes's pleasant "Musical Evenings," at the Royal Academy of Music, took place on Wednesday evening with a sterling selection of classical instrumental music, Mr. Holmes being the leading violinist and Madame Haas the pianist.

St. David's Day was celebrated by special concerts—of a national character—on Wednesday evening, at the Royal Albert Hall and the Alexandra Palace.

Mr. W. Bache's orchestral concert took place on Thursday evening, the programme having consisted entirely of music by Liszt. Of the performances we must speak next week.

Miss Josephine Agabeg will give her third annual evening concert on Tuesday, the 14th inst., at Steinway Hall.

The prospectus of Mr. W. Ganz's new series of afternoon orchestral concerts is of great interest, the arrangements including the production (for the first time here) of Liszt's grand symphony to Dante's "Divina Commedia"—for orchestra and chorus of female voices—a new pianoforte concerto by Signor Sgambati (of Rome), and the music of Gluck's opera "Iphigénie en Tauride"—besides the repetition of many great masterpieces. The first concert will take place on April 22; the dates of the others being May 6, 20, June 3, 17.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

An important and influential meeting was held on Tuesday at St. James's Palace, under the presidency of the Prince of Wales, with the view of promoting the establishment of a Royal College of Music for providing systematic instruction for all classes of her Majesty's subjects. His Royal Highness read letters expressive of sympathy with the movement which had been received from the Duke of Connaught and Prince Christian, and then explained the reasons which had induced him to call the meeting, and described briefly the nature of the college which it is proposed to establish. The first resolution, approving of the proposal to establish a Royal College of Music as a national institution was moved by the Duke of Edinburgh, seconded by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and supported by Lord Rosebery and the Lord Mayor. It was unanimously adopted. A vote of thanks passed to the Prince of Wales for presiding was moved by Mr. Gladstone and seconded by Sir Stafford Northcote, both of whom expressed their strong approval of the project and their high sense of the service rendered to the country by his Royal Highness in having initiated the movement.

The following was the preliminary list of subscriptions:—Her Majesty, £500; the Prince of Wales, £250; the Duke of Edinburgh, £250; the Duke of Connaught, £100; the Duke of Albany, £100. Among other offers of support that have been already made are the following:—Her Majesty's Commissioners of 1851—£500 per annum, representing, at twenty-five years' purchase, £12,500; Mr. Frenke's Building, presented by Mr. Frenke; Sir Richard Wallace, Bart., M.P., £1000; Mr. S. Morley, M.P., £1000; Messrs. Robert Cocks and Co., £1000; Messrs. Collard and Collard, £1000; Sir Edward Scott, Bart., £600; the Duke of Westminster, £500; Mr. J. J. Colman, M.P. for Norwich, £500; Mr. Jeremiah Colman, of Carshalton Park, £500; Mr. Pfeiffer, £500; Sir Donald Currie, M.P., £500; Mr. Thomas Chappell, £500; Mr. Howard Morley, £500; Mr. Charles Morley, £500; Messrs. Boosey and Co., £500; Baron Ferdinand Rothschild, £250; Mr. Warren De la Rue, £250; Messrs. Elkington and Co., £210; Mr. Edward L. Lawson, £200; the Earl of Rosebery, £100; Messrs. N. M. Rothschild, £100; Mr. Arthur Chappell, £100; Messrs. Ashdown and Parry, £100; Messrs. Metzler and Co., £100; Mr. Joseph Williams, £100; Mr. Maxwell, £100; Mr. Carl Rosa, £100. Additional subscriptions, to a considerable amount, were promised at the meeting.

THE VOLUNTEERS.

It is officially announced that the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Connaught, and other members of the Royal family will be present at the Easter Monday Review at Portsmouth.

A memorandum has been issued to commanding officers of volunteer corps notifying that 15,000 Volunteers will be allowed to attend the military manoeuvres which it is proposed to hold in the vicinity of Aldershot in the autumn of the present year.

Princess Mary Adelaide presented the prizes to the Queen's (Westminster) last Saturday evening, the ceremony taking place in Westminster Hall. The regiment showed, it was stated, a satisfactory increase in efficiency and numerical strength. A handsome testimonial was given to the Duke of Westminster in token of his long connection with the regiment. At a dinner subsequently held Sir Garnet Wolseley, Lord Elcho, and Mr. W. H. Smith, M.P., were among the guests. Sir Garnet Wolseley expressed the hope that the time would come when every regiment in the Army would consist of battalions of regulars, of militia, and of volunteers.

The Prince of Wales presided at the regimental dinner of the Civil Service Rifles at Willis's Rooms on Wednesday to commemorate the twenty-first anniversary of the formation of the corps. He was supported by the Duke of Portland, the Duke of Manchester, Lord Bury, Lord Suffield, and many other noblemen and gentlemen, including the Secretary for War, who takes an interest in the Volunteer movement.

During the past week 53,581 indoor and 44,558 outdoor paupers were relieved in London, making a total of 98,139 against 101,154 in the corresponding week of last year. The principal falling off is in the north district, both the east and south showing an increase. The number of vagrants relieved was 843.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

Paris, Tuesday, Feb. 28.

On Sunday last Victor Hugo entered upon his eighty-first year. The event was celebrated, by order of the Minister of Fine Arts, at the Comédie Française by a gratuitous performance of "Hernani," followed by the crowning of the bust of the poet and the recitation of some verses on the occasion by François Coppée. The event was also celebrated in a similar way at the Gaité and at the Odéon. At the poet's house in the Avenue Victor Hugo there was a family dinner, followed by a reception, at which some three hundred people were present. Of course, these manifestations cannot be compared with the apotheosis of this time last year; still they are worthy of notice. Victor Hugo is, as it were, witness of his own immortality, and after having been the most abused man in France he has become the most universally acclaimed. In spite of his great age, Victor Hugo is in good health, and his mental activity is still great. He writes every day, and his posthumous works will certainly form many volumes. Since the "Burgraves" were hissed at the Comédie Française in 1843, Victor Hugo has firmly refused to allow any of his unpublished dramas to be played until after his death. These dramas are locked up in an iron box with other manuscripts. They are "Torquemada," "La Grand'mère," "L'Épée," "Peut-être, Frère de Gavroche," and a fairy piece, "La Forêt Mouillée," in which the characters are trees and flowers:

Lent, the period of penitence and mortification, does not make much difference in the existence of the majority of the Parisians. Balls, and even masked balls, continue to be given. The second and last ball at the Elysée will take place on Thursday, the 2nd, and on Sunday the President and his wife will celebrate by a family dinner the fête of their son-in-law, Mr. Wilson. Nevertheless, some of the high-life journals, which combine so ingeniously worldliness and penitence, religion, and poudre de riz, maintain that dancing during Lent is improper. You may receive in the evening, but you can only offer "a game of whist, a grave chat, a little classical music, and fruit syrups!" Furthermore, flowers are forbidden; "in the salon and the retire, nothing but green foliage plants. But in the oratory, bouquets of roses, branches of lilac, masses of primroses." And to think that the more democratic we become the more people like to read this kind of back-stairs high-life "truck," as the Americans would call it! How much more edifying it is to learn that the Countess of Paris has been safely delivered of a daughter at Cannes! and then, by reference to the "Almanach de Gotha," to find that the newly arrived Princess has two sisters and a brother, who were born in England, and whose ages are respectively seventeen, eleven, and thirteen years!

M. Tissot, who is to succeed M. Challemeil-Lacour as French Minister at London, is a doctor of letters, corresponding member of the Academy of Inscriptions, author of a treatise "De laen Tritonide," and of several archaeological and geographical monographs; in short, a most erudite and accomplished gentleman, who has seen much of men and things, and who is anxious to see more. Therefore he likes to have people to dinner, and so the French Legation is likely to be more animated than it has been for some time past.

Yesterday the senators were convoked to an extraordinary sitting. M. Tirard had an important communication to make relative to the affair of the Anglo-French Treaty of Commerce. The prorogation expired to-day, and, as the negotiations now in hand have not yet led to any result, M. Tirard wished the old treaty to be once more prorogued until May 15. The Senate voted the proposition without discussion.

Two senatorial and ten legislative elections took place last Sunday; in all cases the moderate Republicans were successful. The Monarchists are getting more and more resigned to their fate. They recognise that they cannot contend against the Republic. "The increasing heaviness of taxes," says a leading Conservative organ, "the encroachment upon all liberties, the contempt of the rights of conscience, the brutal malevolence of the governors for all who do not think as they do, the systematic keeping away of all who have worth or position, such are the principal arguments on which we count for the enlightenment of opinion. Well! we must confess they do not seem to have great influence." This admission is an eloquent commentary on the present state of France, a state with which the majority are quite satisfied.

It is astonishing what the Parisians will do for foreign women. For the last month everybody has been talking about a young Russian girl, Mlle. Julie Feyghine, for whom, it was said, the Comédie Française was mounting Musset's piece, "Barberine." And we were told marvels about Mlle. Feyghine's blonde hair, about her skill in riding, rowing, and shooting. She was to rival Sarah Bernhardt in eccentricity and talent. Well, "Barberine" was played last night, much too solemnly and pompously. The piece turned out to be not particularly interesting on the stage, far inferior to the average of Musset's pieces, cold and artificial. And Mlle. Feyghine? Charming; but she shows no dramatic talent, and then her efforts to overcome her Russian accent succeed only in converting it into the accent of Auvergne!

On Monday the Assize Court of the Seine judged Emile Florion, a young weaver who came to Paris from Reims, on foot, last October, in order to assassinate Gambetta. It appears from the young man's own confession that for three days he hung round the Palais Bourbon, armed with a revolver, on the watch for "the man with a glass eye." But, as the President is not in the habit of going out on foot, Florion never managed to catch him. Then, with a view to killing some member of the bourgeoisie, Florion shot at a Doctor Meymar, in the Avenue de Neuilly. He missed the doctor, and then tried to shoot himself, and missed again. The doctors have pronounced Florion to be quite sane. In court, yesterday, he spoke with perfect consistency, and with the most ferocious hatred of the capitalists who exploit the working classes. He is a victim of the rantings of Louise Michel and of the other Socialist orators. In wishing to kill Gambetta, Florion wished to revenge labour against capital. He simply carried into execution the theories that are proclaimed almost daily in the Socialist meetings and the Socialist journals. The Court condemned the young man to twenty years' penal servitude; and he was taken out of court howling, "Vive la Révolution Sociale!"

T. C.

The Prince of Wales on Monday presided over a public meeting in connection with the Great International Fisheries Exhibition, at Willis's Rooms. The Duke of Richmond and Gordon read the report, and a resolution approving of this document and of the exhibition to be opened on May 1, 1883, was moved by the Duke of Edinburgh, who expressed his sense of the importance of developing the fisheries of Ireland, now almost entirely neglected by the native population. Earl Granville seconded the motion; and amongst the other speakers were the Marquis of Salisbury, the Earl of Kimberley, Sir Alexander Galt, and the Lord Mayor.

The Extra Supplement.

THE SAVAGE CLUB.

The Prince of Wales, in the graceful little speech delivered at the annual dinner of the club at Willis's Rooms, caused some amusement by stating that one of his nephews had wondrously expressed surprise because he was about to dine with Savages. It was necessary for his Royal Highness to explain that the savagery of the brotherhood, with which he during the evening allied himself, was nothing more than an expression. There are many persons even now to whom it is necessary also to explain that the club is not named after Richard Savage. The title was a bit of spontaneous fun amongst the originators, and they, so to speak, drove it home by adorning their rooms with spears, war-clubs, shields, tomahawks, and certain hideous effigies. Many clubs of a more or less Bohemian character have sprung up since, a quarter of a century ago, in an upper chamber in Vinegar-yard, the brothers Brough, Sala, Albert Smith, Frank Talfourd, the brothers Mayhew, Planché, and Andrew Halliday, formed the nucleus of the Savage band. An establishment of its own it never had, until, last year, it secured quarters at Lancaster House, in the Savoy. There were no regular annual dinners till lately, but at odd intervals the club emerged from its sequestered shade, and fitfully flashed across the public notice. It made an excellent start in 1860 by giving an amateur performance at the Lyceum Theatre in aid of the families of Bayle St. John and Dr. Franke. The Queen, the Prince Consort, the Prince of Wales, and the Princess Royal were in the Royal box, and the performance was artistically and pecuniarily an enormous success. During the exhibition of 1862 the Savage Club gave, at St. James's Hall, a dinner to the foreign journalists who had come to London as special correspondents; the chairman was Mr. Lowe, editor of the Critic, with Andrew Halliday and George Cruikshank as vice-chairmen, and the novelty which attached to the entertainment itself was intensified in the fact that seven languages were spoken by the post-prandial orators. In the following year an annual supper of a very unpretentious character was held at the Lyceum Tavern, and when the Club migrated to the Gordon Hotel what was virtually the first annual dinner was held under Mr. Tom Archer's chairmanship. This also was unpretentious; the price of the dinner ticket was limited to four shillings, and the simple tastes of the members were further illustrated on that occasion in a memorable outburst of horror when some unsophisticated Savage suggested that dress suits should be worn, and long pipes forsworn. The annual dinners, even when established, were not regularly observed; but there were special feasts—notably that to Mr. Godfrey Turner, on his return from the Jamaica riots. The chairman, John Oxenford, and the vice-chairmen, the two fast friends, Tom Hood and W. J. Prowse, have one by one passed away since that merry and enthusiastic gathering. Four or five years ago the Savages became, for that occasion only, Grosvenor Gallery young men, with Mr. Sala (literally one of the originals) in the chair, flanked right and left by such heavy guns as Sir Garnet Wolseley, Baker Pasha, and Major F. Burnaby, with his Khivan honours still thick upon him. The next dinner was at the Pell Mall Restaurant, Lord Dunraven in the chair, and Mr. Gladstone as chief guest. The Savage Club, amongst its other public performances, may reckon, without shamefacedness, moreover, the publication of its two volumes of amusing "papers." Of course in its recent acquisition of the Heir Apparent as an honorary member it has surpassed all previous efforts. The dinner at Willis's Rooms, as all the world knows, was a remarkably successful entertainment. Afterwards, the Prince of Wales repaired to Lancaster House, and in the attendance book in the lobby there appears the name "Albert Edward" writ fair and large, to witness to his induction. The club consists of nearly three hundred members, men of all ages, and mostly qualified by working connection with the professions which may almost be said to constitute the joyous science of modern times. At first the members were almost entirely journalists and playwrights, hard working journeymen of their craft, the survivors of whom have witnessed changes of which probably they never dreamed. How many ventures, even during twenty years, have made shipwreck! How marvellous the developments in Literature, Science, and Art! The Savage Club of to-day is fairly leavened with representatives of the guilds which go hand in hand together. Authors, journalists, actors, dramatists, artists, and musicians, who have made their mark, or who hope to make it, meet together on a common ground in the endeavour to help each other in the daily exercise of their callings.

The entertainment which followed the annual dinner was similar to that which occurs every Saturday evening after the modest repast which the Savages call their "House Dinner;" and Mr. Harry Furniss has happily depicted the best points of it in our Engraving. Messrs. Clarke, Drew, Hargitt, and Stanislaus are here opening the proceedings with a march (composed by Mr. Hargitt) upon two pianofortes; and everyone will recognise the genial, comical face of Mr. Toole in his mirth-provoking sketch, "Trying a Magistrate." A medley of Scotch airs by Messrs. Ratcliff and Barrett, two of the most accomplished Flautists of the day, is succeeded by Mr. George Grossmith's "Itinerant Niggers," whose fun is agreeably contrasted by the pathos of Mr. Maybrick's "Midshipmite." Comedy again comes to the front in Mr. Lionel Brough's "Muddled Railway Porter," and is succeeded by tender sentiment as Mr. Harry Walsham makes love a sweet sorrow in the melody of "Peggy Blane." Mr. Pyatt's fine bass voice seems to revel in the depths of the sea as he sings of the fate of the Diver; and surely no "Street Juggler," with cup, ball, and saucer, can excel in dexterity Mr. John Proctor's amazing imitation of his performance without any tools of the trade. Mr. Paulton's marvellous gravity is seen as he delivers his side-splitting lecture upon "Time," which everybody has lost and nobody has found. Mr. Soden's relation of the embarrassing but eventually happy consequences of a "Bath at Eastbourne" is succeeded by Mr. Maclean's "Tinkler's Wedding," a ballad of many verses, sung with an outburst of sustained energy that takes away the breath of everyone but the singer. Mr. John Farmer's "Music Lesson" brings us back to a "Parlour Pastime" frame of mind, but we are presently wafted away into the Sublime by Mr. Odell's recital of Mr. H. S. Leigh's fantastic "Legend of Farnival's Inn." Mr. Arthur Matthison's "Little Hero" is, as it deserves to be, in high favour with the public; but the "Silver Wedding," as recited by Mr. Fernandez, brings a refreshing surprise even to the admirers—and their name is legion—of that accomplished actor. The ceremony of the Prince of Wales signing the "Attendance Book" is witnessed, with varying expressions of interest, by the committee; and the "Group of Savages" are all men of note in their respective callings. The scene in the wigwag represents Mr. Frank Marshall singing burlesque praises of the "British Burglar, Bold and Free;" the Prince duly installed as a "Savage;" and every one of the assembled members desirous of proving himself the "best of all good company."

THE SILENT MEMBER.

The astute and adroit leadership of the late Earl of Beaconsfield may well be sadly missed at this juncture by the Conservative Party. Had the noble Earl been alive, it would scarcely have been possible for a young peer of the comparative inexperience of the Earl of Donoughmore to have led their Lordships into the untenable position they took up when they agreed to the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the working of the Irish Land Act. The Prime Minister, a rare visitor to the House of Lords, was among the distinguished group of Commoners that clustered at the foot of the Throne yesterday week, when final sanction was given to the Committee, composed of the following members:—

The Dukes of Norfolk, Somerset, Marlborough, and Abercorn, the Marquises of Salisbury and Waterford, Earls Stanhope and Cairns, the Earls of Pembroke, Clarendon, Donoughmore, Carysfort, and Dunraven, and Lords Penzance and Brabourne.

The Marquis of Landowne, the Earl of Derby, and Earl Granville seriously counselled their Lordships to forego the inquiry, the sitting of which was, nevertheless, insisted upon by Lord Donoughmore and by the Marquis of Salisbury, and, accordingly definitely settled.

From a tactical point of view, the action of the Lords played completely into the hands of Mr. Gladstone. The Bradlaugh episodes had, to a certain extent, disorganised the Ministerialists, and the adverse divisions had diminished the prestige of the Ministry itself within the walls of the House of Commons. But the decision of the Lords at once reunited the Liberal party. This union was made evident at the large meeting of Mr. Gladstone's supporters on Monday at the Premier's official residence, and was still more manifest the same day in the House, where the enthusiasm of the Ministerialists at the discomfiture of the Opposition was remarkable.

Of such moment was the Prime Minister's resolution held to be that the House of Lords may almost be said to have sat on Monday evening in the Peers' Gallery of the Lower Chamber. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales leant over the barrier, and conversed with the Prince of Waldeck. Every seat in the house was occupied. The thorough restoration of confidence in Mr. Gladstone on the part of the Ministerialists was clear from the hearty ring of the cheers which greeted the Leader of the House when he rose to move that the orders of the day be postponed. The olive-branch held out at the last moment could not be accepted by Sir Stafford Northcote, who was unusually subdued in tone when he mildly suggested that the Lord's Committee would receive any advice the Government might have to tender. The noticeable features of this preliminary conversation were that the extreme wing of the Irish Home Rulers, led by Mr. Justin McCarthy and Mr. Sexton, joined Mr. Chaplin in affirming the necessity of an inquiry into the administration of the Land Act, Mr. Shaw warmly lauded the Act, and sided with the Government in opposing the inquiry. But when it came to dividing, the Leaders of the Opposition appeared to repent of their bargain. Amid laughter from the Ministerial benches, two Irish members, Mr. R. Power and Mr. Redmond, advanced to the table as tellers for the Opposition. Loud and protracted cheering from the same quarter followed the announcement of the numbers—300 for Mr. Gladstone's motion, and 167 against it—majority for the Government, 133.

Inspired, as it were, by the enthusiastic cheers of his Party, Mr. Gladstone then began the speech of the evening with a ringing clearness of voice and a commanding energy such as even the Premier himself can have rarely surpassed. In point of brevity, lucidity, and cogency of argument, and power of delivery, this was, indeed, a model speech; and I venture to submit that members and reporters would alike feel grateful to Mr. Gladstone if he would only speak with equal terseness for the rest of the Session. Disclaiming any intention of inviting a vote of censure on the House of Lords, and pointing to the Commons' resolutions of 1839 and 1841 as precedents for present guidance, the Premier maintained a high level of eloquence throughout, passages of great rhetorical beauty being delivered with special force, that never failed to be emphasised by animated cheers. The Premier particularly dwelt on the fact that the Government relied chiefly on the Irish Land Act wherewith to combat the Land League; energetically insisted that the judicial work of the Act should not be interrupted; and commended to the notice of Mr. Justice O'Hagan the reply which Chief Justice Holt gave to the House of Lords on a memorable occasion, when that courageous Judge stoutly declared he had an authority independent of the House, by which he looked "to be protected, not to be arraigned." It was left to Mr. Gibson, the loudest speaker and most vigorous debater on the front Opposition bench, to defend the Lords' inquiry, and oppose with "the previous question" Mr. Gladstone's motion, which is worded as follows:—

That Parliamentary inquiry at the present time into the working of the Irish Land Act tends to defeat the operation of that Act, and must be injurious to the interests of good government in Ireland.

Much eloquence has since been expended on this engrossing subject. But, happily, at the moment of writing there is a prospect of an agreement between the two Houses on the basis of mutual concession.

The debate on the Closure is meanwhile quietly shelved. The hobgoblin, or spirit of mischief that tempts Mr. Biggar to excess, has more than once prompted the member for Cavan to transgress the bounds of good taste; but this peculiarity on the part of Mr. Biggar has been facetiously accounted for by the reported statement of his schoolmaster that he had "always been a naughty, troublesome little boy." In the face of the opposition of Mr. Biggar and his colleagues, Mr. Gladstone last week secured several votes in Supply. At the beginning of the present week, it was observed that the seat of the leader of the "Fourth Party" (Lord Randolph Churchill being absent from indisposition) was temporarily occupied by Mr. Chaplin. It should also be mentioned that Sir Charles Dilke on Monday stated that the commercial relation of England with France would be that of the status quo up to May 15; that on Tuesday, the Attorney-General prevailed upon the House to declare by a majority of 183 the ineligibility of Mr. Michael Davitt, the political convict, to sit as member for Meath; that the same day, Earl Stanhope introduced into the Upper House a Bill for Reducing the Hours of Labour in Shops—for women and children—but withdrew the measure after a slight exhibition of the Earl of Rosebery's mature wisdom; and that Wednesday was devoted by the Commons to the consideration of Mr. Blennerhassett's Agricultural Holdings Bill for the total abolition of the law of distress for rent, the debate being eventually adjourned.

The London School Board on Thursday week adopted a petition to Parliament desiring that, in any reappropriation of the City trust funds, the suggestions of the Educational Endowments Committee of the Board for devoting the money towards the advancement of education in the metropolis may be considered. The proposal to establish schools for higher education was further discussed, but no decision was come to.

SKETCHES AT THE NORTHAMPTON ELECTION.

The expulsion of Mr. Bradlaugh, M.P. for Northampton, from the House of Commons, by the vote passed on Wednesday week, having made a new election requisite for that borough, the Speaker at once issued his writ; and the nomination took place on Monday last, at the Northampton Guildhall, before the Mayor, Mr. W. J. Peirce. Mr. Bradlaugh was proposed for re-election, and was opposed by a Conservative candidate, Mr. S. Corbett, who had no less than four nominations, the eight nominators being leading Conservatives, and behind these were thirty-two assenting burgesses, including two leading Nonconformists. There were eight assenting burgesses to Mr. Bradlaugh's nomination, which was proposed by Mr. J. Gurney, and seconded by Mr. R. Derby, both of them justices of the peace and former Mayors of the town. A small crowd assembled outside the Guildhall, and, beyond a little ebullition of feeling on the arrival of each candidate, there was no demonstration. The polling was to take place on Thursday. Canvassing was vigorously continued by both parties after the nomination, and in the evening the candidates addressed meetings of their respective supporters. A reward of £20 is offered for any information which shall lead to conviction for bribery. The letter of Mr. Samuel Morley, M.P., in which he recanted his former support of Mr. Bradlaugh, and stated that if he was an elector of Northampton he should vote for Mr. Bradlaugh's opponent "as an act of allegiance to God and to public morality" without the slightest compromise of his attachment to Liberal principles, was expected to influence the Nonconformist. It was believed that the majority of the Roman Catholic votes would also be given to Mr. Corbett or not recorded at all; for at the Roman Catholic Cathedral, on Sunday evening, the Rev. Dr. Scott preached a sermon strongly in opposition to Mr. Bradlaugh's candidature. At Mr. Corbett's meetings the speakers could not be heard in consequence of the disorder which prevailed. All attempts to restore order proved unavailing and eventually the proceedings broke up amid great tumult, free fights being the final result. This took place on Monday evening, at the Skating Rink; and next evening, at St. James's End, the Peacock Hotel, and the West Bridge. Stones were thrown at Mr. Corbett's carriage; and two Town Councillors were pelted, knocked down, and kicked. Mr. H. D. Labouchere, M.P., the sitting member for Northampton, has made great personal exertions on behalf of Mr. Bradlaugh, speaking at the meetings of his supporters, and writing letters in his favour. The result of the polling would be made known at half-past seven on Thursday evening. Our sketches represent a few personal incidents of the election contest.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

SPAIN.

The King and Queen arrived at Cadiz on Saturday last, and met with an enthusiastic reception. While King Alfonso and his suite were out hunting in Andalusia the King's horse was wounded by a wild boar. His Majesty dismounted and killed the animal with his hunting-knife.

HOLLAND.

In the Second Chamber on Monday M. Rochussen, Minister for Foreign Affairs, stated that France had consented to the prolongation of the present Treaty of Commerce until May 15.

GERMANY.

Prince Orloff, Russian Ambassador in Paris, has had interviews with the Emperor and Crown Prince in Berlin, and dined with Prince Bismarck. Such satisfactory explanations of General Skobeleff's speeches have been spontaneously given by the Russian Ambassador in Berlin that the incident may practically be regarded as at an end.

An infernal machine inclosed in a case exploded in a Berlin railway station on Tuesday week. It had been deposited for transmission, and was insured for a large amount, the contents being described as velvet, feathers, and furs. An arrest has been made.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

In the sitting of the Lower House of the Reichsrath last Saturday the Secret Service Fund was agreed to after a long debate. The members of the left voted against it. The Upper House on Tuesday adopted the bill for establishing extraordinary tribunals in Dalmatia. The bill for a general Austro-Hungarian Customs tariff, which imposes protectionist duties upon a large number of articles, was then discussed. The bill passed in the form in which it was adopted by the Lower House.

Some severe fighting is reported from the Herzegovina, the Austrians advancing in four columns and utterly defeating the insurgents where they offered resistance. As a result, it is alleged of these defeats, thousands of rebels have found their way into Montenegro in a starving condition.

RUSSIA.

According to information received in Vienna, the Emperor and Empress of Russia intend to visit St. Petersburg on March 13, to attend a funeral service at the tomb of Alexander II. On the following day there will be a Court reception at the Gatchina Palace, when congratulations will be offered to their Majesties on their accession to the throne.

Judgment has been delivered in the Nihilist trial in St. Petersburg. Ten of the prisoners, including a woman, were sentenced to death; the rest to terms of penal servitude.

It has been determined by the Government to proceed during the current year with the construction of the following railways:—From Ekaterinburg to Tiumen, Siberia, a distance of 310 versts; a branch line of the Donetz Coal Railway; lines for the salt districts of Elton and Perekop; and a railway from Kieff to Viasma. The aggregate length of the proposed lines will be 1000 versts.

On Tuesday the Sultan gave audience to M. de Novikoff, the Russian Ambassador, whom he received with cordiality.

GREECE.

The debate on the election returns has begun in the Chamber of Deputies. On Monday the Chamber invalidated the election of M. Adamantos, for the town and island of Milo. The question was regarded as the first trial of strength between the Government and the Opposition. The resolution invalidating the election was carried by the Opposition by 112 votes against 95 recorded for the Government, who received the support of the party of M. Deliyannis.

AMERICA.

The President has nominated ex-Senator Roscoe Conkling for the office of Judge of the Supreme Court, and ex-Senator Aaron A. Sargent for the post of Minister to Germany.

The Senate yesterday week passed the bill placing General Grant on the retired list of the Army, with a salary of 10,000 dols. a year.

The House of Representatives on Tuesday passed the bill removing the discriminating duty of 10 per cent upon tea and coffee from places to the east of the Cape of Good Hope.

Congress has appropriated 100,000 dollars to the Secretary for War to issue rations to the sufferers by the Western floods.

Meetings of sympathy with the persecuted Jews of Russia have been held all over the States.

CANADA.

Sir S. L. Tilley presented the Budget in the Dominion House of Commons last Saturday. In the course of his speech he mentioned a number of articles to be added to the free list, and a number upon which duties would be altered. He said that at no period of the history of the country had the Government met Parliament with the finances in as good a position, credit so high, or the people more prosperous. He claimed that this state of affairs was greatly dependent upon the protective policy which was pursued. He estimated the revenue of the Dominion for 1882-3 at 30,600,000 dols., and the expenditure at 27,600,000 dols. The sales of land in the North-West, he said, would more than pay all the expenses incurred in making the Pacific Railroad.

It was announced that the Government had not considered the question of taking over the Canadian telegraph system. The bill legalising marriage with a deceased wife's sister has passed the second reading.

A telegram from Ottawa of Tuesday states that Sir Henry Parkes, Premier of New South Wales, had arrived there, and is the guest of the Marquis of Lorne.

The Hon. J. J. Ross, Speaker of the Legislative Council of Quebec, and Commissioner of Agriculture and Public Works, has resigned. It is stated that Mr. Archambault will succeed to the vacant seat in the Cabinet, while Mr. Labrueyre will become Speaker without portfolio. Mr. Ross's resignation is attributed to the Government having sold the Occidental Railway to the Pacific Syndicate.

In the sitting of the Nova Scotian Legislative Council, on the 23rd ult., the Railway Consolidation Bill passed through committee; and the Hon. Adams Archibald, Lieutenant-Governor, has signed the bill. A bill for abolishing the Legislative Council has been introduced.

The Legislature of British Columbia was opened on the 24th ult. by the Lieutenant-Governor, the Hon. C. F. Cornwall, who, in his speech on the occasion, stated that the revenue of the colony had exceeded the expenditure, and that the public debt had been diminished.

Sir Henry Bulwer, the new Governor of Natal, arrived at Capetown on the 23rd ult.

The returns of the elections to the Hawaiian House of Assembly point to the complete downfall of the old missionary influence, and the condemnation of their policy.

A telegram from Calcutta states that Gourepore has been partially destroyed by fire, and that the damage is estimated at twelve lacs of rupees. The fire is believed to have been the work of an incendiary.

The Queen has approved the appointment of Sir Henry T. Irving, K.C.M.G., lately Governor of Trinidad, to be Governor of the colony of British Guiana, in the place of Mr. C. H. Kortright, C.M.G., who retires on pension.

The Cape emigration agent sent out to the colony during February 299 emigrants, as against 196 in February of last year. They consisted of 249 artisans of all kinds and domestic servants, 33 agriculturists, and 17 recruits for the Cape Mounted Riflemen.

The English cricket team, under the captaincy of Mr. Alfred Shaw, after returning from New Zealand, played a return-match at Sydney against a combined Australian eleven. The Australians won by five wickets. A telegram from Melbourne on Tuesday states that the English team have won a match against the Victorian eleven by eight wickets.

A report has been issued by the Admiralty of a visit paid by her Majesty's ship Thetis to Pitcairn Island in April, 1881. The people were very happy and contented, and in perfect health. Their only fear was that they would be forgotten. The commander of the Thetis assured them that such would not be the case, and that as long as they continued to deserve attention the Admiral of the station would always, when able to do so, send a man-of-war to the island.

Commander Selby was buried at the Scutari Cemetery on the 22nd ult. Lord Dufferin and the members of the British Embassy attended, as well as the Russian Ambassador and the whole English colony in Constantinople. An aide-de-camp represented the Sultan. Mrs. Selby was detained by ice on the Danube, and did not arrive in time for the funeral. The four Albanian shepherds accused of Mr. Selby's murder underwent a preliminary examination on Sunday. The defence is that they know nothing about it. They had no hatchet, they say. They warned Captain Selby not to frighten their flocks, and bound him when he disregarded the injunction, but only to take him before the head shepherd, who ordered his release.

ART NOTES.

Mr. Keeley Hallwelle, Mr. Jos. Knight, Mr. J. MacWhirter, A.R.A., and Mr. R. Caldecott, have been elected Members of the Institute of Painters in Water Colours.

A marble statue to the memory of Sir Thomas White, a London merchant and Lord Mayor, in the reign of Queen Mary, is to be erected in Coventry by public subscription. He gave a large sum of money for the benefit of that city in 1542. The sculptors are Messrs. Wills, of London.

On Tuesday evening the president and council of the Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts had, by permission of the Lord Mayor, a conversation at the Mansion House, to meet the members of the City of London Society of Artists. The guests numbered about 2000. There was a large display of works of art, and a concert in the Egyptian Hall.

Earl Spencer, Lord President of the Privy Council, has appointed the 8th inst. for receiving a numerous deputation from the leading provincial towns which have libraries and art-galleries, whose representatives are anxious that larger help should be given by Government to such institutions by grants of duplicates or reproductions of works of art from the National Gallery, British Museum, &c., as well as by extending the circulation system from South Kensington.

Llandudno has been selected as the permanent locality for the Cumbrian Academy of Arts, owing to its contiguity to Bettws-y-Coed and other sketching centres in the Vale of Conway, and the inaugural exhibition is fixed for June. Mr. Norbury has been elected the first president, and amongst the honorary members are Sir F. Leighton, Mr. Millais, Mr. Marks, Mr. Alma Tadema, and several more R.A.'s. The movement has the support of Lord Aberdure, the Earl of Denbigh, Lord R. Grosvenor, M.P., Sir W. Wynn, Bart., M.P., and other noblemen identified with Wales.

Mr. George Augustus Sala presided last Saturday evening at the distribution of prizes to the pupils of the West London School of Art, Great Titchfield-street. The school was founded in 1862, and, having completely outgrown the accommodation provided for it, it was removed some three years since to the present building specially erected for it. It is now the largest school of art in the metropolis. There was a large gathering of the students and their friends, who greeted Mr. G. A. Sala on his arrival to take the chair with hearty cheers. Mr. J. Hawle, head-master, read a report, in which he stated that the students had sent in 3888 works to South Kensington for examination, being 1311 more than in 1880. In the National Art competition they had gained four silver medals, five bronze medals, and six Queen's prizes, compared with three in 1880. Besides these they had gained a large number of prizes, general and local. Eleven pupils had gained four studentships, and Mr. Oscar Jurick, a former pupil, had gained a gold medal and travelling studentship. Mr. George Augustus Sala, who presided, gave one of his felicitous addresses:—

It happened (he said) that during more than a quarter of a century he had been, not only from sympathy but from the nature of his professional vocation, intimately connected with the interests of that art which was the object of his boyish and passionate love, and was still his stay and solace in the autumn of his life. England had been favoured as a nation with five distinct boons, which had materially conduced to the promotion of art education and to the destruction of that ugliness which not so very long ago prevailed throughout the length and breadth of the land. The two first were the acquisition by the Government of the Elgin Marbles and the Great Exhibition of 1851, with its long and brilliant line of followers. The third was the revival of Gothic architecture, which was due partly to the Ritualism that followed the publication of "Tracts for the Times." A fourth boon came to us from a very far-off country indeed—Japan. From China we had learned little save to make willow-pattern plates. But from Japan we had learned a thousand beauties in design, in composition, in colour; and, although he was by no means crazy about "blue and white," although he could bear up under the spectacle of a satsuma vase, and was not thrown into hysterics by an eight-mark teapot, he cheerfully recognised the vast benefits which our artists had received from the study of Japanese art. The fifth boon was photography, which had done truly valuable service in enabling us to contemplate exact representations of the great works of ancient art. It was clear that the immense art production that was going on around us could not be accomplished without an amazing amount of hard work; and if he had any practical object in addressing them that evening it was to impress on them the indispensable necessity of hard work. Let them labour with the determination to excel—first, in order that they might have the means of earning an honest livelihood; next, that they might become good citizens; and, lastly, for the pursuit of happiness (Cheers). A vote of thanks was enthusiastically accorded to Mr. Sala.

In the Registrar-General's return for last week it is stated that in London 2812 births and 1941 deaths were registered. Allowing for increase of population, the births exceeded by 117, and the deaths by 138, the average numbers in the corresponding week of the last ten years. The deaths included 8 from smallpox, 35 from measles, 34 from scarlet fever, 15 from diphtheria, 185 from whooping-cough, one from typhus fever, 27 from enteric fever, 14 from diarrhoea and dysentery, and one from simple cholera: thus 318 deaths were referred to these diseases, being 91 above the corrected average number in the corresponding week of the last ten years. The deaths referred to diseases of the respiratory organs, which had been 994 and 769 in the two preceding weeks, further declined to 545 last week, but exceeded by 46 the corrected weekly average number: 344 were attributed to bronchitis, and 128 to pneumonia.

THE COURT.

Her Majesty's life has been a busy one during the past week in carrying out both State and family duties. The Queen did not attend public service on Sunday, but Princess Beatrice, Prince Leopold, and Princess Hélène of Waldeck were present at Divine service in the morning, performed in the private chapel at Windsor Castle by the Rev. T. Teignmouth Shore.

At the council held on Monday by her Majesty, at which the Duke of Connaught was present, the Sheriffs of England and Wales were pricked; as also the Sheriff of the Duchy of Lancaster. The Right Hon. John Bright, the Premier, and Earl Spencer had audiences. Mr. W. H. White, of the War Office, was knighted; and the Hon. Saul Samuel, Agent-General for New South Wales, presented an album to the Queen, containing views of the colony. Princess Louise of Lorne arrived at the castle.

Her Majesty came to town on Tuesday. Princess Christian, Princess Beatrice, Prince Leopold, and Princess Hélène of Waldeck also came to Buckingham Palace. Earl Granville had audience of the Queen, and the French Ambassador presented his letters of recall. The Duchess of Cambridge was visited by her Majesty and the members of the Royal family from Windsor. Their Royal Highnesses also visited the Prince and Princess of Wales at Marlborough House, the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, and the Empress Eugénie. Princess Christian and Princess Beatrice went with the Duke of Edinburgh to Her Majesty's Theatre in the evening.

The second Drawingroom of the season was held on Wednesday by her Majesty. The Court has since returned to Windsor.

The Royal family circle at the castle since the arrival of Prince Leopold and his bride elect has been augmented by distinguished guests joining the daily dining circle. The Duke and Duchess of Connaught remain at the castle. Her Royal Highness, who is now able to take slight exercise within the palace and goes out occasionally for a drive in the grounds, progresses favourably, though slowly, towards convalescence.

The Levée held by the Prince of Wales on behalf of her Majesty at St. James's Palace, on Thursday week, was very numerously attended; the Royal circle, including the Prince of Waldeck and Pyrmont, the Duke of Edinburgh, the Duke of Connaught, and the Duke of Cambridge, and also the Prince of Leiningen, Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, and the Duke of Teck. The usual state ceremony was observed.

The Queen has accepted the dedication of "Moro, the Painter of Antwerp," Balfe's latest-published opera.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The occupations of the Prince have been various. Last Saturday he presided at a council of the Duchy of Cornwall at Buckingham Gate, the Earl of Mount Edgumbe and Mr. Holtzman taking the oaths as members of the Council. Visits were interchanged between his Royal Highness and Prince Waldeck of Pyrmont, who was at Buckingham Palace; and in the evening the Prince accompanied the Princess and his daughters to Drury Lane Theatre. Sunday was passed in the usual manner, the Royal family attending Divine service. The Prince presided on Monday at a meeting, held at Willis's Rooms, in connection with the proposed International Fisheries Exhibition of 1883; and in the evening he was in the Peers' Gallery in the House of Commons with the Prince of Waldeck-Pyrmont and the Duke of Teck, the Duchess of Teck being in the Ladies' Gallery. On Tuesday his Royal Highness held an important meeting at St. James's Palace to consider the advisability of establishing a National School for Music, he being supported by the Duke of Edinburgh and other Royal personages. The Prince and Princess visited the third annual English Cart-Horse Show at the Agricultural Hall, Islington, in the afternoon. On St. David's Day the chair at the regimental dinner of the Civil Service Rifles, held at Willis's Rooms, was filled by his Royal Highness. The Prince has had some runs with the Queen's hounds at Windsor, and he has also accompanied the Princess to the Strand Theatre and other places of amusement. Their Royal Highnesses will give a dance next Friday to celebrate the anniversary of their wedding day.

Princes Albert Victor and George of Wales landed at Ismailia on Wednesday, being received by the British Consul-General. After twenty-four hours of quarantine at Moses's Wells, the Princes were to pass up the Suez Canal on board the Bacchante. In obedience to instructions from the Foreign Office, Sir E. Malet will accompany their Royal Highnesses on a ten-days' trip up the Nile. Ismail Pasha Youssri has, by order of the Khedive, been specially detached for personal attendance on the Princes during their stay in Egypt.

The electrical exhibition at the Crystal Palace was last Saturday opened by the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, who were accompanied by the Prince of Waldeck and Pyrmont.

Princess Louise of Lorne a few days since paid a visit to the Home for Fallen Women, Kerby-street, Poplar. Her Royal Highness was received by Mrs. Wilkes, the lady superintendent, and others connected with the institute, by whom she was conducted over the establishment.

The Duke of Connaught was present at the non-commissioned officers' ball, which was given at the Townhall, Windsor, after having dined with the officers of the Royal Horse Guards at the cavalry barracks. The Duke has appointed May 10 for the ninety-fourth anniversary festival dinner of the Royal Masonic Institution for Girls, at which he will preside.

Prince Leopold presided at the anniversary festival of the Royal Caledonian Asylum at the Freemasons' Tavern.

The Duchess of Teck presented the prizes to the Queen's (Westminster) Rifles last Saturday in Westminster Hall.

The Rev. W. A. Fearon, M.A., of Winchester College, has been appointed to the head-mastership of Durham Grammar School, vacant by the resignation of the Rev. Dr. Holden.

The arrivals of live stock and fresh meat at Liverpool from the United States and Canada last week show a very slight increase on those of the preceding week; the totals being 176 cattle, 890 sheep, 7180 quarters of beef, 1461 carcasses of mutton, and 250 hogs.

Following the example set by the Marquis of Bute, Mr. G. W. Duff-Asheton Smith, a land proprietor in Carnarvonshire, has intimated his readiness to assist in giving effect to the recommendations of Lord Aberdare's departmental commission upon higher education in the Principality by offering an eligible site at Carnarvon for the college recommended by such commission. The proposal has been taken up by the Town Council and other local public bodies, and memorials advocating the claims of Carnarvon, as the chief town in North Wales, as the locus of the college suggested by the commission are being extensively signed for presentation to the Education Department. Bangor, through the medium of its public bodies, is also presenting a case for the favourable consideration by the department of its claims to the college.

The Convocation of York has been prorogued to March 16, and that of Canterbury to May 9.

We learn that the Dean of St. Paul's has accepted the presidency of the Armenian Education Aid Society, in place of the late Dean Stanley.

The Bishop of Rochester has conferred an honorary canonry in Rochester Cathedral on the Rev. Alfred Carver, D.D., Head Master of Dulwich College.

The Church of St. Paul's, Warrington, erected early in the century, has been renovated, at a cost of £1500, through the energy of the Vicar, the Rev. S. Wilkinson.

The Bishop of London has invited a considerable number of laymen to meet him at Willis's Rooms on Tuesday, March 7, to consult with him as to the expediency of organising a Diocesan Conference for the diocese of London.

There is Morning Prayer (shortened form) in the Choir of Westminster Abbey, at 8.30 a.m. daily. On Saints' Days, during the school term, the services will be at 7.45. Entrances by Port's Corner, West Door, and West Cloister Door.

On Monday the annual court of the Clergy Orphan Corporation was held at the board-room of the S.P.G.—the Archbishop of Canterbury in the chair. The report showed that £6720 had been raised during the year from voluntary sources, but there is a debt due of £421 to the treasurer.

The Church of St. Mary, Rawtenstall, near Manchester, has been enriched by the erection of a costly five-light stained-glass window, given by Mr. Worswick, in memory of the late Mr. Ashworth and his sister. I. A. Gibbs and Howard, of London, are the artists.

The nine panels of the reredos of Christ Church, Lancaster-gate, have been filled with mural paintings representing the Last Supper on a stumped gold background, as a memorial to the late Vicar, by his widow. Messrs. Reaton, Butler, and Bayne, of London, designed and executed the work, under the supervision of Messrs. F. and H. Francis, the architects.

An interesting ceremony took place in Bishop Auckland on the 20th ult., when the Bishop of Durham opened a large and handsome building, which he has recently erected at a cost of nearly £2000, and presented to the committee of the Young Men's Church Institute in that town, and which, in honour of its founder, the members have determined to call the "Bishop Lightfoot" Institute. The service was followed by a public tea, and by a meeting of the members of the Institute and their friends, who assembled under the presidency of the Bishop, in the large hall of the institute.

The Judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of "Martin v. Mackonochie" was delivered by the Lord Chancellor last week. Their Lordships, while fully admitting that it lies within the discretion of the Judge to inflict, according to circumstances, a more or less severe punishment, denied that he is at liberty, in any ecclesiastical suit, to refuse by decree to pass sentence on a clerk who has been found guilty of offences against the law. It was distinctly stated in the Judgment that it will still rest with Lord Penzance to consider what should be, under all the circumstances of the case, the nature and measure of the punishment to be inflicted.

Two interesting services were held on Sunday, the 12th inst., at St. John's Church, Upper Lewisham-road, of which Canon Money is the Vicar; the occasion being the dedication of a stained window, given by Mr. J. Simpson and members of his family in memory of the late Mrs. Simpson, who was one of the earliest worshippers at the church. The sermon in the morning was preached by the Bishop of St. Alban's, who spoke touchingly of his former connection with the parish. In the evening the preacher was the Rev. Mr. Bucke, of Lee. St. John's Church is now one of the most beautiful churches in the suburbs of London; and the parish connected with it is a model of good management, speaking well for the untiring zeal and Christian labours of Canon Money.

The Incorporated Society for Promoting the Enlargement, Building, and Repairing of Churches and Chapels held its usual monthly meeting on the 16th inst., at the society's house, No. 7, Whitehall—the Ven. Archdeacon Harrison in the chair. Grants of money were made in aid of the following objects:—Building new churches at Gloucester (St. Paul), £200; Holly Hall (St. Augustine), in the parish of Dudley, £200; and Penrhinweibr, in the parish of Mountain Ash, near Aberdare, £100; rebuilding the church at Cray St. Hill, in the parish of Devyock, near Brecon; enlarging or otherwise improving the accommodation in the churches at Abargorlech, in the parish of Llanbythel, near Carmarthen, £30; Ashill St. Mary, near Ilminster, £20; Bunhill-row (St. Paul's), Finsbury, £75; Pentraeth (St. Mary), near Menai Bridge, Anglesey, £20; and Washington (Holy Trinity), near Lence Houses, Durham, £50.

BENEVOLENT OBJECTS.

General Sir Garnet Wolseley has consented to become a member of the council of the Royal Army Coffee Taverns.

The Fishmongers' Company have given fifty guineas to the Homes for Working Boys, Buckingham-street, Strand.

The United Law Clerks' Society, having been in existence half a century, is about to celebrate its jubilee at the Freemasons' Tavern. Lord Justice Holker will preside.

Mr. W. H. Houldsworth, the Conservative candidate for Manchester, has made a gift to the Young Men's Christian Association in that city of £5000 worth of shares which he holds in the buildings occupied by the association.

The Lord Mayor has received a letter from the Lord Provost of Glasgow, inclosing a cheque for £1500 in aid of the Jewish Relief Fund, being a first instalment from that city. Mrs. Joseph Montefiore has forwarded £100 to the fund.

The anniversary festival of the Hospital for Sick Children is fixed for the 8th inst. The Duke of Connaught in the chair; and Prince Leopold, Duke of Albany, will preside at a festival dinner on the 14th inst. in aid of the funds of the National Hospital for the Paralyzed and Epileptic.

At the quarterly court of governors of the Brompton Hospital on Thursday week it was stated that when the new extension building was opened, it would require an additional income of about £10,000 a year, and the committee accordingly appealed for liberal help. Legacies to the amount of £1550 were announced.

At the general meeting of the Newspaper Press Fund last Saturday Sir Algernon Borthwick, who presided, drew attention to its satisfactory condition, pointing out that £500 had been added to the credit of the capital fund, which now amounted to £13,250. Prince Leopold will preside at the next annual dinner.

Prince Leopold presided on Thursday week at the sixty-seventh anniversary of the Royal Caledonian Asylum, Holloway. He was accompanied by the Prince of Waldeck, the father of his fiancée, with whom he had an enthusiastic reception from the assembled company, which in numbers approached 400, and comprised many ladies. Subscriptions to the amount of nearly £1300 were announced.

Mrs. Frances Grant, of Rock Ferry, Cheshire, has set apart £100,000, the income derived from which is to be paid for the relief of deserving poor, without reference to class or creed. The income amounts to about £1000 annually, and in the distribution of the money Mrs. Grant takes a lively interest. Mrs. Grant gave £10,000 for the foundation of a Chair in connection with the Liverpool University College.

A ball in aid of the funds of the Jews' Infant Schools, Commercial-street and Tenter-street, E., will be held at Willis's Rooms, King-street, St. James's, next Tuesday. Mr. James Castello, 19, Montagu-square, W., and Mr. Arthur L. Raphael, 31, Portland-place, W., are the hon. secs. of the ball committee; and Mr. Alfred Henry, 57, Moorgate-street, E.C., hon. treasurer of the committee.

A new cabmen's shelter was opened last Saturday morning at Northumberland-avenue, Charing-cross. This shelter, which is the thirty-first erected in London by the Cabmen's Shelter Fund, is the gift of the Misses Charrington, in memory of the late Mr. J. E. Charrington, one of the earliest supporters of the shelter movement. The committee have awarded a prize of £10 10s. to Messrs. Harvey and Clarke for the design.

The twenty-sixth anniversary dinner on behalf of the Dramatic and Musical Sick Fund was held on Wednesday week night at Willis's Rooms. The Lord Mayor, who presided, proposed "Success to the Fund," explaining that its object was to aid sick and indigent artists, and to relieve their families when in distress. A "smoking concert" followed, and at the close subscriptions were announced amounting to nearly £400.

The Archbishop of Canterbury preached on Sunday to a crowded congregation at the Church of St. Martin-in-the-Field's, Trafalgar-square, in aid of the St. Martin's League, an organisation originated by the Rev. A. H. Stanton, for the religious, intellectual, and social improvement of employees connected with the Post Office. The Rev. A. H. Stanton writes to say that the League requires £200 towards paying off the debt on the seaside house at St. Leonard's.

Sir R. W. Carden, M.P., presided at a meeting, held at the Mansion House yesterday week, in aid of a scheme for the establishment of homes for waifs and strays in connection with the Church of England. It is at present intended to have two central homes for boys and girls, and small receiving-houses in each diocese, where the children would be kept until suitable permanent homes could be provided for them, either in this country or in the colonies. The Earl of Aberdeen, Mr. Alderman Fowler, the Rev. J. W. Horsley (Chaplain of Clerkenwell Prison), the Rev. R. C. Billing, Mr. Littler, Q.C., Canon Shuttleworth, and Archdeacon Hesse were among the speakers. At the close of the meeting several sums of money, including ten guineas from the chairman, were handed to the hon. secretary.

At the recent meeting of the central board of management of the Shipwrecked Fishermen and Mariners' Society, held at its central office, Hibernia Chambers, London Bridge, the sum of £4061 was specially awarded from the society's funds for distribution in annual grants of additional relief to the necessitous widows and orphans of seafaring men of all classes. The recipients of this much-valued timely aid, to the number of 3068 in all, on the present occasion comprised, as usual, about one half of the needy applicants borne upon the society's list; the remaining half of the 6500 widows and orphans thus annually relieved by the issue of this extra charitable help receiving their grant in a similar way in the month of July each year, and making a total amount of more than £8000 altogether so distributed yearly in the carrying out of this one portion alone of the society's varied objects. With regard to its general work and operations, both at home, abroad, and in the colonies, it appears from the statistical records of the society, now just completed for 1881, that, owing to the exceptionally destructive gales which prevailed, from time to time, throughout the year with such disastrous results, the urgent claims for immediate succour to shipwrecked fishermen and mariners themselves, or to the suddenly-bereaved dependents of those lost at sea, have proved to be almost without a parallel during the whole of the forty-three years which have elapsed since the society's first institution.

A case of some importance to managers and to proprietors of clubs was heard by Mr. Justice Field and Baron Huddleston on Tuesday. In an appeal made against the decision of Mr. D'Eyncourt, the magistrate at Westminster, who had fined the manager of the Grosvenor Working Men's Club for selling without a license intoxicating liquor to be consumed off the premises, their Lordships reversed the decision, as they were of opinion that all the members of the club were joint owners of the articles sold, and the transaction was not, therefore, a sale within the Act.

GENERAL HOME NEWS.

The Mercers' Company have promised £250 towards the £100,000 voluntary subscription fund for Paddington Park.

The directors of the Bank of England have reduced the minimum rate of discount from 6 per cent to 5 per cent.

The annual dinner of the Association of Chambers of Commerce of the United Kingdom was held on Wednesday.

Easter greeting cards, of various designs, all graceful, have been issued by Messrs. Marcus Ward and Co.

A notification has been issued from the Horse Guards fixing the date for militia training in Great Britain during 1882. It is added that the militia of Ireland will not assemble this year.

Dr. Murrell, lecturer on Materia Medica and Therapeutics at the Westminster Hospital, has been appointed Examiner in Materia Medica at the University of Edinburgh, in succession to Dr. Lander Brunton, F.R.S., who has resigned.

The account of the receipts and disbursements of the Duchy of Lancaster shows that the receipts last year amounted to £80,643. The payments made for her Majesty's use to the keeper of her Majesty's purse prior amounted to £43,000.

Mr. Monk, M.P., presided on Tuesday at the annual meeting of the Associated Chambers of Commerce, held at the Westminster Palace Hotel. The laws relating to patents, bankruptcy, and partnerships, with other subjects, were discussed.

The Duke of Rutland has consented to hunt the whole of the Belvoir country as hitherto. Sir Reginald Graham has, in consequence of ill-health, resigned the mastership of the Tedworth Hounds.

Thomas Kirkwood, a former trusted servant of the Balcarras family, has been arrested and charged with complicity in the theft of the body of the late Earl of Crawford and Balcarras from the Duncricht mausoleum. John Philip, of Aberdeen, has also been taken into custody. The accused, whose arrest is said to be due to anonymous letters offering to restore the body for a ransom, underwent a preliminary examination last Saturday afternoon.

At yesterday week's meeting of the Metropolitan Board of Works a report from the Fire Brigade Committee submitted plans of the additional buildings proposed to be erected in Southwark Bridge-road, the total expense being estimated at £20,500. Several members objected to so large an outlay, and suggested that plans should be prepared for an equally useful but less elaborate structure. Ultimately, however, the report was adopted, with only one dissident.

Lord Aberdare presided on Monday evening at a meeting of the Royal Geographical Society, at which a paper was read by Major J. E. Sandeman, of the Bengal Staff Corps, on the Irawaddy and its sources. An announcement was made that the Government would propose a grant of £5000 and that the council of the society would subscribe £1000 towards the expenses of the expedition for the relief of Mr. Leigh-Smith and the officers and crew of the Eira.

At a meeting of the trustees of the Mason Science College held in Birmingham on Thursday week the executors of Sir Joshua Mason presented a statement showing the amount to which the college will be entitled under the will of Sir Josiah Mason. After paying claims on the estate and providing for legacy duty, about £20,000 will accrue to the college within the next three years, and after certain life interests are satisfied, a further sum of about £15,000 will be available, making a total of £35,000 for the estate. The benefactions of Sir Josiah Mason to the college building, endowment, and legacies will then amount to a total of £210,000. The building and endowment of the orphanage and almshouses represent a sum of about £260,000.

There have been the following remissions of rent and tithes recently:—The Earl of Airlie has allowed a concession of 5 per cent on the rents of his tenantry paid at Alyth this week. At the rent audit of the Duke of Cleveland, held at Bridgenorth, 20 per cent was returned on the rent of the tenantry in that district. Viscount Boyne also has remitted to his tenants on the Burwarton estates, Shropshire, 10 per cent on the rentals. Mr. Robert Jardine, M.P., of Castlemilk, has intimated to his Dumfriesshire tenants that an abatement of 10 per cent will be made from the half-year's rents payable this week. This is the seventh time in succession that a similar abatement has been made on this estate. The Rev. E. R. Benyon, of Culford, Suffolk, has allowed a concession, in some cases amounting to 25 per cent, on the rents of his tenants for the past quarter. The Rev. H. O'Rourke, Rector of Feltwell, Norfolk, has returned to his tithepayers 10 per cent of the tithes for the past year. The Rev. C. J. Evans, Rector of Ovington, Norfolk, has paid one half of the last quarter's poor-rate on behalf of his tithepayers, in lieu of returning them a percentage of the tithes for the past year. A large meeting of Sussex farmers, held at Mayfield last Saturday, passed a resolution urging the speedy abolition of extraordinary tithes.

Bernard Bailey, who some time ago gave information to the police which led to the seizure of a large quantity of Fenian arms and ammunition in Dublin, was shot dead on Saturday night in an alley in Dublin. The Lord Lieutenant has offered a reward of £500 for the discovery and conviction of the murderers. The Coroner's inquiry into the murder of Bernard Bailey in Dublin was opened on Monday. The widow said she believed her husband had been shot because he had given information to the Castle which led to a seizure of arms. She knew he had been threatened, and said he had been unable to get employment, the whole of the lower orders in the city being against him.—A shocking agrarian outrage is reported from county Clare, a farmer being shot in the legs, one of his sons being murdered, and another stabbed in the head by a disguised party who visited the farmer's house on Saturday to punish him for having paid his rent. In his Lenton pastoral, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Tuam denounces the shocking outrages on human life that have lately occurred, the peculiarities of which, so utterly un-Irish showed them to be of foreign importation, the work of the enemies of the people.

The annual ball given to the patients of the Royal Hospital of Bethlem took place on Wednesday evening. The Resident Physician, Dr. G. W. Savage, assisted by Mr. G. H. Haydon, the Steward, and other officers of the Hospital, had arranged this entertainment so as to afford the greatest pleasure to the inmates, male and female, who seemed thoroughly to enjoy themselves. A party of visitors, including some of the Governors with their families and friends, witnessed the festive proceedings.

It is proposed to build a new church on the West Cliff, Whitby. The site has been given by Sir George Elliot, Bart., M.P., who, in addition, has promised to contribute £2000 to the building fund. Among the other donations are Mrs. Cholmley, Abbey House, £1000; and Mrs. Christopher Richardson, £500. There are twelve other donations of £100 each, so that the sum actually subscribed and promised is £4700, in addition to the site, which is a valuable one. The cost of the new church will be between £10,000 and £15,000.

THE CHÂLET DES ROSIERS, THE INTENDED RESIDENCE OF THE QUEEN AT MENTONE.

MENTONE.

The best account of this place, where her Majesty is about to sojourn for about three weeks, is to be found in the instructive volume, by Dr. J. Henry Bennet, entitled "Winter and Spring on the Shores of the Mediterranean," which has reached a fifth edition, and is published by Messrs. J. and A. Churchill, New Burlington-street. Dr. Bennet, who is one of the most eminent London consulting physicians, more especially for diseases of females, has during above twenty years past made Mentone his winter residence, continuing medical practice there; and he is the acknowledged chief authority upon the capabilities of that place as a health resort. Mentone is a small Italian town of twelve thousand inhabitants, situated nineteen miles east of Nice, on the Cornice road to Genoa, at the foot of the Maritime Alps, in the coast region of the Western Riviera. It was the largest town of the Principality of Monaco, before the cession of that Principality to France, but is only a mile and a half from the present frontier of the Kingdom of Italy, at Pont St. Louis, where the bridge spans a ravine 260 ft. deep. The entire bay, from Cape Martin to Punta della Murtola, a width of five English miles, opening south-east, is divided into the western and the eastern bays, the town being placed between them; and the whole is completely sheltered by a grand amphitheatre of mountains, rising to 3000 ft. or 4000 ft. high, but with gently sloping hills, or rounded ridges, densely clothed with olives, descending from 1500 ft. to 500 ft., and to the seashore. These lower hills, intersected by frequent ravines and deep valleys, and covered with a luxuriant vegetation, present diversified and beautiful scenery. The East Bay, of which we give an illustration, is the most sheltered part, and here both orange-trees and lemon-trees yield their flowers and fruit in perfection. On this part of the shore is the villa of Mr. Charles Hentrey, the Chalet des Rosiers, which has been offered and accepted for her Majesty's temporary residence. We are indebted to Miss Louisa James, of the Villa Melanie, Mentone, for the sketch of the Chalet des Rosiers.

FANCY-DRESS BALL AT THE ALBERT HALL.

It was to benefit the funds of the Bolingbroke House Pay Hospital, that the costume ball took place, on Monday week, at the Royal Albert Hall. That institution, of which we have before spoken, has been established for patients who need good hospital nursing and constant medical treatment, but who can and will pay a moderate weekly charge. The Executive Committee have secured Bolingbroke House, on Wandsworth Common, for this purpose, and have properly fitted up the mansion; but there is a debt to be cleared off. The Fancy-Dress Ball is one of a series of entertainments to raise the money wanted; and it has proved successful, as the secretaries were compelled to refuse a large number of late applications. The ball was of a very brilliant character, the costumes being uncommonly tasteful and varied. Although the floor was by no means favourable to dancing, the music of the Grenadier Guards' band, under the leadership of Mr. Dan Godfrey, appeared to invite dancers to disregard all difficulties. The lady patronesses included the Countess of Egmont, the Viscountess Folkestone, Lady Constance Howard, Lady Otho Fitz-erald, Lady Emily Harding, Lady M'Garel-Hogg, Lady Lawrence, Lady Peck, and the Lady Mayoress. The executive committee and the honorary secretaries, Mr. J. S. Wood and Mr. T. Simpson, had the honour of receiving the congratulations of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales on the success which had crowned their efforts. We give a few sketches of the fancy costumes worn at this ball.

THE MAGAZINES FOR MARCH.

FIRST NOTICE.

"Love the Debt" is concluded in the Cornhill—a curious, tantalising story, half pathetic, half cynical, with undeniable power, only not the power to give pleasure. "Damocles" belongs to a type of fiction frequent in this periodical, easy in dialogue, clever but somewhat prolix in description, clever in constructing and prolonging sentimental situations. Mr. James Thompson's poem, "The Sleeper," is an almost over-dainty and elaborate picture of a maiden's slumber, in very elegant verse. Equal power of description is shown in the genus of landscape that stud a charming sketch of West Connaught, evidently from the pen of the Hon. Miss Lawless. "Upstairs and Downstairs" describes some interesting philanthropic undertakings for the benefit of friendless girls. Another very interesting contribution is a chapter on the youthful biography of J. F. Millet, the great painter of peasant life in France, in whose works idealism and realism seem perfectly united.

The principal contributions to the Nineteenth Century relate to the controversies of the day. The discussion on the Channel Tunnel is resumed by Colonel Beaumont, who proves that the tunnel could be of no possible service to an invader if every defender did exactly what ought to be done—a condition in Colonel Beaumont's view likely to be fulfilled; but unlikely in the judgment of Lord Dunsany, who is reinforced by Mr. Goldwin Smith from a civilian's point of view; while Mr. Fowler advocates the alternative scheme of trains transported by large steam-boats. A trio of doctors discuss the subject of vivisection, Mr. George Fleming in particular pointing out the great benefit the practice has conferred upon animals in contributing to the relief of their diseases. But he and Dr. Brunton seem to concur with Sir William Gull in upholding the present restrictions—a compromise which will probably be accepted. Cardinal Manning's protest against Mr. Bradlaugh is more calculated to help than to damage that gentleman, for the principles which his Eminence is pleased to lay down might easily be expanded to exclude all but Catholics. Sir Alexander Arbuthnot shows with unanswerable clearness to what an extent the agitation against the opium trade rests on imperfect information. The most interesting of the other papers are Mr. Keibel's able essay on "The Spirit of Party" and Canon Jackson's demonstration, supported by documents recently discovered at Longleat, of the weakness of the evidence against Leicester in the case of Amy Robsart.

Nearly all the articles in the Contemporary are effective, and relate to topics of immediate interest. Canon Farrar contributes a spirited defence of the Revised Version against the criticisms of Sir Edmund Beckett. He successfully vindicates the revisers, in so far as the accuracy of their version is concerned; but he will not alter the general impression that it would in many instances have been better to have put up with trifling errors than to have disturbed venerable associations. The Duke of Argyll, treating the prevalent agricultural depression from the landlord's point of view, advocates absolute non-interference. Sir Arthur Hobhouse and Professor Thorold Rogers respectively present in a clear form the views of the reformers of the London Corporation, and of the procedure of the House of Commons. M. Auguste Viter contributes an account of the late financial crisis in France; and the scientific department is represented by some apparently rather fanciful speculations of Mr. Proctor's on the past history of the moon, and a luminous sketch of the race of monkeys by Mr. A. R. Wallace. Mr. Wallace disputes the claim of monkeys to rank at the head of quadrupeds, their affinity to man notwithstanding.

The most remarkable article in the Century is a very careful and laboriously dispassionate estimate of Lord Beaconsfield by Professor Bryce, who can only be congratulated on the success with which he has divested himself of the spirit of political antagonism. There are, also, an excellent criticism of W. D. Howells, a delightful paper on Leigh Hunt by Mrs. Cowden Clarke, one of the few who remember him in his earlier days; a continuation of the pleasant papers on Mexican travel, and a capital illustrated sketch of the black bear. Harper, besides copiously illustrated papers on "Travel in Mexico," "Old New York Coffee-Houses," "Small Telescopes," and "The Mendelssohn Family," has an interesting historical account of the circumstances under which Washington accepted the presidency, and a memoir of a very remarkable religious impostor, named Stroug, a kind of Joseph Smith on a smaller scale, who founded a miniature kingdom on Beaver Island, in Lake Michigan.

OBITUARY.

THE DOWAGER COUNTESS OF ESSEX.

The Right Hon. Katherine, Dowager Countess of Essex, whose death is just announced, in her eighty-eighth year, was daughter of Mr. Edward Stephens, and, having early devoted herself to music, acquired the highest reputation as a vocalist. In 1812, she made her debut at Covent-Garden Theatre as Mandane, in "Artaxerxes" and was for many years after one of the most admired singers of her day. Her voice, a soprano of wondrous purity and compass, made her rendering of pathetic ballads simply perfect. At the very height of her popularity, Miss Stephens retired from public life, and shortly afterwards, April 14, 1838, married (as second wife) George, fifth Earl of Essex. Just one year later she was left a widow, and so remained until her death, honoured and esteemed by friends of all ranks.

BARONESS GRAY.

The Right Honourable Mary Anne, Baroness Gray, widow of John, sixteenth Lord Gray, of Gray and Kinfauus, died on the 16th ult., at Pau. Her Ladyship, who was the daughter of Lieutenant-Colonel Charles Philip Ainslie, of the 4th Dragoons, and grand-daughter of Sir Philip Ainslie, of Pilton, was married, July 23, 1833, to John, Lord Gray, of Gray, in the county of Forfar, in the peerage of Scotland, one of the Representative Peers, who died, without issue, on Feb. 20, 1869, when the title, created in the fifteenth century, passed to his niece Margaret, Baroness Gray, who died in 1878, and was succeeded by her kinsman, the present Earl of Moray, who is now also Baron Gray.

REV. W. H. RIDLEY.

The Rev. William Henry Ridley, M.A., Rector of Hambleden, Buckinghamshire, and Hon. Canon of Christ Church, Oxford, died on the 17th ult., at Brighton. He was born in 1816, the eldest son of the Rev. Henry Colborne Ridley, Rector of Hambleden, by Mary, his wife, daughter of Mr. James Farrer, of Ingleborough, Yorkshire, and was nephew of Sir Matthew White Ridley, Bart., M.P., and of Nicholas William, Lord Colborne. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford (where he graduated), and, being ordained in 1839, he became Rector of Hambleden in 1840, Rural Dean of Wycombe in 1859, and Hon. Canon of Christ Church in 1871. Mr. Ridley married, in 1841, Sophia Albertina, second daughter of Dr. Sumner, Bishop of Winchester, and had issue.

MR. MASSINGBERD-MUNDY, OF ORMSBY HALL.

Mr. Charles John Henry Massingberd-Mundy, of Ormsby Hall, Lincolnshire, died on the 19th ult. in London, aged seventy-three. He was only son of Mr. Charles Godfrey Mundy, of Burton Hall, Leicestershire (of the family of Mundy, of Markeaton), by Harriet, his wife, daughter and heiress of Mr. Charles Burrell Massingberd, of Ormsby, in the county of Lincoln, and of Braziers, in the county of Oxford, and assumed by Royal license, in 1863, the additional surname and arms of Massingberd. He received his education at Eton, and at Christ Church, Oxford, and was a magistrate and deputy lieutenant for the Lindsey division of Lincolnshire, in which county he was lord of several manors. He married, Sept. 13, 1848, Elizabeth Susan, daughter of the late Mr. John Young, of Westridge, Isle of Wight, by whom he leaves issue. The family of Massingberd is of considerable antiquity and position in the county of Lincoln. Thomas Massingberd, cousin of Sir Drayner Massingberd, the ancestor of the Massingberds of Ormsby, sat in the English House of Commons as member for Calais.

ADMIRAL LONEY.

Admiral Robert Loney, whose death occurred recently, at a very advanced age, entered the Navy so far back as 1797, more than eighty-two years ago, and saw service in a very brilliant period of our maritime warfare. In 1808 he took part in the gallant engagement fought by H.M.S. L'Aigle with two French frigates and the enemy's batteries at Isle de Croix, and not long after, being attached to the Walcheren expedition, assisted in forcing the passage between Flushing and Cadzand. The rank of Commander was conferred on Loney for his services in the Savage off Oporto during the Civil War in Portugal, in 1835. He became a Captain on the reserved half-pay list in 1852, Vice-Admiral in 1873, and Admiral in 1879.

MR. PERRY-WATTLINGTON.

Mr. John Watlington Perry-Watlington, of Moor Hall, Essex, M.A., J.P. and D.L., formerly M.P. for South Essex, died at Dover on the 24th ult. He was born Dec. 7, 1823, the only son of Mr. Thomas Perry, of Moor Hall, by Maria Jane, his wife, daughter of Mr. George Watlington, of Caldecote Hall, Herts, Prothonotary of the Common Pleas, and in 1848 assumed the additional surname and arms of Watlington. In 1855, he served as High Sheriff of Essex, and from 1859 to 1865 represented the southern division of that county in Parliament. He was also a Chairman of Quarter Sessions, and a Commissioner of Prisons under the Prisons Act. He married, Sept. 6, 1849, Margaret Emily, third daughter of the Rev. Charles Wicksted Ethelston, of Wicksted Hall, Cheshire, and had only one child, John, who died in infancy.

We have also to record the deaths of—

Colonel Caldwell, a very old and esteemed resident of Rome, at the Palazzo Tittoni, on the 21st ult., aged ninety-six.

The Rev. Dr. Robertson, minister of New Grey Friars Parish, Edinburgh, on the 21st ult., at Cannes, at the age of seventy-six. He was the originator of the first ragged school in Edinburgh.

Mr. George Leeman, late M.P. for York, ex-chairman of the North-Eastern Railway, twice Lord Mayor of York, and the holder of several important public offices, at Scarborough, on the 25th ult.

The Rev. William St. Aubyn, M.A., Rector of Stoke Damerell, at Devonport. He was third son of Sir Edward St. Aubyn, first Baronet, of St. Michael's Mount, Cornwall, and brother to the present Baronet.

Thomas William Coventry, late of the 15th Hussars, on the 16th ult., at Portslade, in his eighty-second year. He was only son of the Hon. Thomas William Coventry, and was grandson of George William, sixth Earl of Coventry.

Captain Charles Cavendish Nevile, 2nd Battalion Wiltshire Regiment, on the 18th ult., at Skelbrooke Park, near Doncaster, aged thirty-five. He was youngest son of the late Mr. John Pate Nevile, of Skelbrooke Park, and a descendant of the great and ancient house of Nevile of Chetiv.

The Hon. John Constable Maxwell, on the 16th ult., at Westwood Park, Droitwich, aged twenty-five. He was son of William, late Lord Herries, by Marcia, his wife, eldest daughter of the Hon. Sir Edward M. Vavasour, Bart., of Hazelwood, in the county of York.

The Rev. Charles Sheffield, M.A., Rural Dean, Vicar of Burton-on-Stather, and Rector of Flixborough, Lincolnshire, on the 20th ult., in his eighty-fifth year. He was son of the Rev. Sir Robert Sheffield, third Baronet, by his second wife, Sarah Anne, daughter of the Rev. Brackley Kennett, D.D. He married, in 1820, Lucy, daughter of Colonel Smelt, and had four daughters.

ART-BOOKS.

Without intending any disparagement to Mr. Solly's "Life of Cox," already published, we may say that there was ample room for the new Biography of David Cox (Cassell, Petter, Galpin, and Co.), which lies before us, from the perusal of which we have derived unmixed pleasure. The author is the late William Hall, a Birmingham artist of considerable ability, who enjoyed a close intimacy with Cox during the whole period of his residence at Harborne, near Birmingham, and who frequently travelled with him on his sketching tours in Wales. Some additions of interest have also been made by J. Thackeray Bunce, likewise of Birmingham. Mr. Hall, besides the advantage of possessing Cox's unreserved confidence for thirty years, evidently had other and rare qualifications for his task. As well as being an artist of refined feeling, he had a shrewd, healthy, critical faculty, much in advance of his day, and he was no mean writer. His estimate of Cox as a man may have been influenced by friendly regard, and he may possibly claim for his friend's works a higher rank than they may permanently hold; yet his remarks on the principles of art exemplified by Cox for seeing and interpreting nature are valuable for their sympathetic insight, whilst the truths they contain are of general application. The picture he presents of his friend's simple, unaffected, manly character—his perseverance and fortitude during many years of struggle and discouragement; his modesty when he attained comparative fame and competency, and his single-minded devotion to the beloved pursuit by which he so nobly helped to raise British art in public estimation—is charming in the extreme. The difference between the prices that Cox received for his drawings and pictures in his lifetime and those which they fetched within twelve years of his death, in 1859, will ever remain one of the most significant phenomena in the history of British art. It seems incredible, yet it is the fact, that he only once received so much as £100 for any work of his whatever. His ordinary and latest charge for a small drawing—quarto imperial size—was £10; and for a drawing of imperial size—his exhibition size—£40; and his prices for oil-pictures were proportionately small. Compare these modest sums with those which some of his works fetched in or about the year 1872—as, for instance, 2000 guineas for "The Vale of Clwyd," £1550 for the "Hay-field," £1575 for the "Old Mill at Bettws," £2300 for "The Skylark,"

£2300 also for "The Seashore at Rhyl," and no less than £3601 for the "Peace and War"! Yet it may have been better for the artist himself and for his art that such prices were not realised in his lifetime. We need not narrate the leading incidents of Cox's almost idyllic life; nor have we space to quote any of his biographer's very sensible and serviceable comments on his works. It must suffice to commend the book heartily to the reader.

The fourth volume of the monthly serial The Magazine of Art shows no falling off in the excellence of its wood engravings or the popular character of its general contents. The letterpress is, however, very unequal, and the criticisms are often too superficial and fragmentary to possess any authority. Less fulsome panegyric of living painters would be more dignified; and the small value of several of the critiques on the annual exhibitions is shown alike in the pictures frequently selected for commendation and in what is said of them. One of the most interesting papers is that on the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood by Mr. William M. Rossetti, who, as one (like his brother Mr. Dante G. Rossetti) of the members of the Brotherhood, and as editor of their organ "The Germ," is an important witness respecting facts that are often misrepresented. Mr. William Rossetti says that the "P. R. B." was formed only of Messrs. Holman Hunt, J. E. Millais, Dante G. Rossetti, and James Collinson, painters, Thomas Woolner, sculptor, and Frederick G. Stephens and himself, art-critics. We have it, however, on authority equally weighty, and necessarily as well informed, that Mr. Ford Madox Brown (who Mr. William Rossetti declares is often spoken of as a pre-Raphaelite, but not accurately) was potentially a member of the fraternity, if he did not so style himself, if he did not inscribe the mystic initials on his pictures, and if he was not nominally included with them. It was, though the writer of the paper makes no mention of the circumstance, either Mr. Madox Brown, the senior of the painters, and apparently then at least the best informed in art history, or Mr. Millais (we forget which, but the fact can and should be verified), who introduced to the others certain engravings from the frescoes of the Campo Santo at Pisa, and the admiration these excited led in all probability to the assumption by the Brotherhood of the term Pre-Raphaelite. It still remains, we think, for art-critics outside all influences that may create a bias towards partizanship, unconscious or conscious, to estimate the value and duration of what is called Pre-Raphaelitism, and how far it may or may not have been an exaggerated and transient part or phase of a far wider movement.

In our reviews of the various exhibitions we have from time to time spoken highly of the landscapes of the "young artist," as perhaps we have too long called him, Mr. A. F. Grace. We were not, however, prepared for his appearance as a teacher and writer in a book so vastly superior to the ordinary run of manuals of technical instruction as A Course of Lessons in Landscape Painting in Oils, which has lately been published by Messrs. Cassell, Petter, Galpin, and Co. By way of introduction, Mr. Grace gives an historical and critical account of the great landscape-painters, which is dispassionate and generally acceptable, though some of the assertions are rather too bold and sweeping. For the lessons themselves—on "How to See" and "To Study," on "Form," "Linear and Aerial Perspective," "Colour," "Tone," "Chiaroscuro," and other technical matters—we have nothing but praise; and the instruction is strong meat compared to the milk-sop pabulum usually offered to art students or amateurs. The illustrations consist of numerous wood engravings and colour-plates. One of the latter is from a poetical picture of moonrise, by Mr. Grace himself (now in the European galleries), and others are from landscapes by celebrated English masters. The margin of these coloured illustrations is gilt paper, but as the tone of this, even when reflecting the light, is much lower than that of a well-gilt mount or frame, which it is intended to represent (and there is, besides, none of the life of relieved ornament), the effect is decidedly unfavourable.

Under the title of Etude sur la Gravure au XIXe Siècle, M. Le Roy de Sainte-Croix, of the "Journal des Arts," has written an admirable Catalogue raisonné of the engravings, &c., published by Mr. Gambart and his successors, Messrs. Pilgrem and Lefevre, and latterly Mr. Lefevre alone. When we recall how many of the finest engravings of our time have been published by this firm, the occasion for this "Etude," and the propriety of its comprehensive designation appear justifiable. We have said that it is a "catalogue raisonné," but the words must be understood in a liberal and honourable sense. The "introductions" and incidental remarks comprise criticism of wide bearing expressed in excellent literary form.

OUR OWN COUNTRY. Each containing nearly 200 original illustrations and steel frontispiece. Each volume complete in itself.

"The beautiful work which Messrs. Cassell and Co. are publishing under the title of 'Our Own Country,' appeals to a very wide circle of readers. To those who have visited the places and scenes described and pictured, it must be a pleasure to turn over the leaves of this richly-illustrated work, and by its aid revive old impressions hidden away in the corners of the memory; while to those who are ignorant of the beauties of their native land, and find it impracticable to make personal acquaintance with them, could not go to a better source to have the defect in their education supplied. The treatment is full and comprehensive, embracing architecture, scenery, history, and antiquities, industry and art, physical geography, and natural history. The work is creditable to author, draughtsman, and engraver."—Times.

INTERNATIONAL ELECTRIC EXHIBITION AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

No one half a century ago would have dreamed of beholding the refulgence to-day shed by the influence of a subtle and invisible force acting with all its potency upon substances which it seems but as yesterday were regarded as worthless. No proverb ever spoke more truly than that which declares necessity to be the mother of invention. The time is well within the memory of living men when gas as an illuminant was scarcely known, and by those, indeed, who were acquainted with it, it was regarded more as a source of danger than as a boon to humanity. In the earlier years of this dying century our streets, where they were lighted at all, knew only of tallow dips or oil-lamps; watchmen carried lanterns and servant torches. Turning again to the source of gas—coal—was not that regarded as a public nuisance; and is it not a fact beyond dispute that it continued to be so regarded until wood became too scarce? Then coal was received, tolerated, and finally welcomed. Nor was it anything short of absolute necessity which decreed the substitution of gas lamps for the dingy wick. Time marches onward, and with it the minds and wants of men do their utmost to keep pace. Hence it is that man, thinking the time may be within reasonable distance when coal supplies will fail, asks for something to take its place. His very mode of existence, too, declares that the gas flame is far too poor a substitute for solar light, and lends its voice to the demand for something better. It almost appears as though man has but to ask for a thing, and, sooner or later, it must come. Hence demand has succeeded to demand, improvement to improvement, until we get now a luminous display that far transcends anything we have ever seen, or could possibly have anticipated. Such a display, however, as is to be seen at Sydenham is not the result of the labours of a day, or even of a lifetime. Thales 2400 years ago contributed his little share in discovering the production of an attractive power by rubbing one substance upon another. Other philosophers followed in their turn as Time hurried his course along, until, just about a century since, Galvani and Volta, labouring in different fields, evolved from their fertile brains the principles which almost constitute the Alpha and Omega in the construction of the many forms of galvanic battery. They asked themselves what this force produced by immersing two metal plates in saline or acidulated water was, and their only conclusion then, as it is now, was that it is simply a force or a condition of matter, as light, heat, &c., are now understood to be.

A few more decades bring us to the time when the immortal Faraday is in his zenith; and of a truth may it be said that his life and work have wrought more to render electricity subservient to man's requirements than any two, or even more, of the greatest of our other intellectual giants. Among the most noteworthy of his discoveries was the relation existing between a magnet and a piece of wire joined at its extremities and formed into a circle or coil. When a magnet approached a wire, a current of electricity was induced in it (the wire), and on withdrawing the magnet another current was induced, which traversed the wire in the opposite direction to that of the previous current. By making the magnet (or the coil) approach and recede rapidly, as rapid a series of currents was produced. The effect was very considerably increased by inserting an iron core in the coil; because as the coil and magnet came into proximity the iron core became temporarily magnetised, and produced the same effect as would result from very suddenly plunging the magnet right into the coil and as rapidly withdrawing it. By this means very powerful currents of electricity were produced, the apparatus being known as a magneto-electric machine.

So we pass on, over the labours of several great men, until we come to Wilde. It had been discovered that when a current of electricity generated in a small galvanic battery is made to pass through a coil of wire surrounding a piece of soft iron the iron is endowed with magnetic properties of enormous power. Such a piece of apparatus is called an electro-magnet, and some little idea may be formed of its strength when it is remembered that one weighing a few pounds is capable of sustaining an otherwise unsupported load of several hundred-weight. Mr. Wilde utilised this principle, and instead of having a magnet to induce the currents in his coils, used an electro-magnet actuated by a few battery cells. As a necessary consequence, he obtained unprecedentedly great results—results, in fact, sufficient to produce what was then considered a grand light. Still greater advances, however, were soon to be made. The degree of softness in a piece of iron determines the resistance or otherwise which will be offered to its demagnetisation after a current has passed round it. As nothing under the sun may be said to be really perfect, it is not difficult to imagine that a piece of iron is never absolutely or perfectly soft—that is to say, the iron will always resist more or less its demagnetisation. This little amount, it was discovered by Wheatstone and others simultaneously, is sufficient to start a series of induced currents, thus obviating the use of a battery. The small amount of remanent magnetism in the electromagnets (or, as they are now termed, the field magnets) induces a proportionate force in the revolving coils, the currents from them being made to pass through the field magnets, and so to increase the strength of the induced currents until the required power is obtained. It has been pointed out that the currents are induced first in one direction, then in the reverse. Generally, therefore, a machine has what is called a commutator, by means of which all the currents are made to leave it in one common direction. The machines of Ladd, Gramme, Siemens, Brush, Edison, &c., are all modifications of these first machines. No great new principle is involved, although, of course, a number of what we may call minor improvements are introduced in each case. It would not be to the purpose to detail these improvements here. As a matter of fact, the best criterion is the relative progress in the results obtained. It is in order that we may do this that the splendid collection at Sydenham is brought together.

Each electric lighting company is doing its hardest to produce the grandest display and create the best impression on the minds of the public and of the members of the deputations from various towns which visit the palace almost daily.

There are two ways of producing light by electricity, known as the arc and incandescent light respectively. Faraday passed the current from a battery of 2000 galvanic cells through two carbon rods. On separating them for a short distance the current spanned the space between them, and in doing so created an arc light of hitherto unknown brilliancy. The intensity of this light now varies (with the strength of the current) from a few hundred candle power up to as high as 150,000-candle power. In incandescent lighting the principle involved is the resistance which a very thin partial conductor offers to the passage of the current, just as a narrow channel in the middle of a river's course would resist and impede the progress of the water. Thus the resistance offered by the thin conductor causes the production of great illumination. If this is done in an atmosphere of air or any similar gas the fibre, or whatever it may be, is speedily volatilized. To prevent this, it is placed in a small pear-shaped globe, from which every possible particle of air is removed. By this device great durability is secured. Mr. Swan claims to have discovered this principle twenty years since, but failed in his experiments because he could not then obtain the necessary vacuum.

The partial conductor originally used was platinum; but nowadays this is replaced by carbonized vegetable matter. Edison uses bamboo, the process of carbonization being very interesting. The fibre is looped and placed in a groove of the required shape between two plumbago blocks, and then, by being raised to a great heat, all the more volatile substances are driven off, leaving almost pure carbon and silica. The fibre is very fine, no thicker than a hair, and very great care is necessary in fitting it into the globe. The effect of the current passing through it for a considerable time is to gradually transfer the carbonaceous particles from one end to the other. Consequently the time must come when the fibre becoming too small, breaks. The usual duration claimed is 600 to 700 hours, but Edison claims 1000 hours as the life of his fibre, which he brings about in a very ingenious manner. He places the fibre in an atmosphere of carbonaceous gas, and by the use of a common burning-glass raises a part of the carbonized fibre to a white heat, when it causes a deposition of carbon on the part heated. In this way he makes one end of the fibre slightly thicker than the other. The extra thickness has to wear down before the transference of the particles of the fibre proper commences.

The luminosity of incandescent lamps varies ordinarily from ten to fifty-candle power although some estimate the intensity at 100-candle power. Arc lamps, generally speaking, are of about 2000-candle power, requiring about one-horse power per light, while the same steam-power maintains on an average ten incandescent lamps. It will thus be seen that while the latter system promises to become of inestimable value for domestic purposes, arc lighting is considerably more profitable for illuminating large spaces. This point is worthy of serious attention, because, all said and done, the question must resolve itself into one of "What will it cost?" and the cost will depend mainly on the steam power required.

Both the arc and incandescent systems are very well represented; and one great benefit the public derives from the Paris and Sydenham Exhibitions is the fusion of several companies, so that now the majority of the arc lights are allied to one or other of the various incandescent systems.

Among the various arc lights which receive the greatest commendation may be mentioned the Brush, Siemens, Gerard, Pilsen, Brockie, Hawkes, and Crompton. There are others; but of these the less said the better. The incandescent lamp harmonises much more with artistic surroundings than does the arc, and, as a natural consequence, there is nothing more beautiful than the numerous "electrolights" (a new name for what we should otherwise call chandeliers), worked in gilt-brass, bronzed steel, cut and tinted glass, &c. There are four systems of incandescent lighting—viz., Edison, Swan, Maxim, and Lane-Fox, the general principles being the same in each.

Unless one sees this Exhibition, he can form no idea of the rapid strides electricity is making to secure the mastery over the other forces controlled by human will.

Telegraphy has long ceased to be a nine-days' wonder; nevertheless, the various exhibits in this class are well patronised. Great interest, too, attaches to the various improvements suggested in our systems of railway signalling; and, judging from recent disasters, our railway magnates are not a moment too soon in carefully investigating these exhibits.

Telephony has forged ahead, and one of the most interesting features to which the attention of the Royal party was drawn on Saturday was the Telephone-room in the eastern gallery. It is connected to the concert-room, and the telephone, which owes its sound-conveying property to the generation of very small magneto-electric currents, responds readily to the vibrations imparted by the organ.

The exhibition may now be said to be fairly opened, and will amply repay any trouble a visit may entail.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE ELECTRIC EXHIBITION.

We present two pages of Engravings, which show many objects of interest comprised in the International Electric Exhibition. The subjects can only be here spoken of with brevity, as our space does not admit of a detailed and minute explanation of the scientific apparatus; but the reader can easily find each illustration of the object noticed.

POST OFFICE TELEGRAPHS.

The contributions of Her Majesty's Government, through the Postmaster-General and the Secretary of State for War, are placed on the main floor, at the north end of the nave. That of the Post Office is spread over two long parallel counters; the one displaying historical specimens of electric telegraphy, and the other showing the apparatus now in actual use. The former begins with the electric dial telegraph of Sir Francis Ronalds, in 1816, and goes on with the needle telegraphs of Cooke and Wheatstone, the contrivances of other inventors not so well known, many improvements of detail in the apparatus, different modes of insulating the wires, both for land telegraphs and in submarine cables, and different kinds of batteries to generate the electric current. The modern postal telegraph apparatus embraces Wheatstone's automatic (working at the rate of 200 words per minute), Wheatstone's A B C, the single needle, duplex Morse, and sounder sets, &c. In addition to these is a quantity of testing apparatus, and specimens of pneumatic tube apparatus, by which messages are sent bodily through leaden tubes from one part of London to another. The other exhibits include Hughes's induction balance and a model of a cable ship.

THE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH AND THE WOODPECKERS.

The section of wood sent by the Norwegian Government is cut from a perfectly sound post, impregnated with sulphate of copper. It is perforated with a hole, forming a circle of the diameter of about three inches and a half, which hole has been pecked out by the birds. Electric telegraph poles are frequently thus treated in Norway, in certain districts situated near pine woods where this bird is found; the holes are, as a rule, at the top of the post. According to the opinion of an ornithologist, the motive should be attributed to the humming sound produced in the post by the vibration of the wire, which the bird imagines to proceed from worms and insects working inside the post. The smaller bird depicted here is the green woodpecker (Picus viduus), the most common of our limited number of British woodpeckers. The larger bird is the great black woodpecker (Picus martius), whose native regions are the northern and eastern parts of Europe.

EDISON'S EXHIBITION COURT.

Mr. Edison's display is unique, and is an exhibition in itself well meriting the encomiums bestowed upon it. He has a number of various telegraph and such-like instruments, but the electric light is of paramount importance. His lamps are all of the incandescent type, the chief feature being their equal luminosity. Two hundred and fifty of them are fixed in the Concert-Room; but his great effort is in the Entertainment

Court. Over the centre of the room is a magnificent gilt-brass electrolier, by Messrs. Verity and Son. It is well adapted to this æsthetic age, the design representing a huge basket of flowers. The sunflower, however, is a little more reticent than its admirers usually consider it, the chief honour being bestowed upon less pretentious aspirants. In these latter, the flower takes the form of coloured glass, each containing a lamp ensconced within it. There are about 120 lamps in all, divided into three sections; so that one third, two thirds, or all of them may be lighted or turned out at will. Eighty other lamps are distributed about the court, illustrating very beautifully their innumerable adaptations.

SIEMENS'S ELECTRIC LIGHT CHANDELIER.

Messrs. Siemens, Brothers, of Charlton, West Woolwich, whose contributions are to be seen in that portion of the palace comprising the crystal fountain, supply at least one of the prettiest features in the palace. They have a magnificent pendant suspended over the fountain basin; and this, when brilliantly lighted up over the water and the ferns beneath, and in the immediate vicinity of the crystal fountain, has certainly a very fine effect.

INCANDESCENT ELECTRIC LAMPS.

Three conspicuous varieties, of which we give some illustrations, are those of Edison, Swan, and Maxim. Their soft, delicious light has as soothing an effect upon the eyes as the most pleasant lamps or the finest candles, and have certainly removed all objections raised to the electric light for internal illuminating purposes. One of our illustrations shows the Edison lamps fitted up in front of a mirror, such as would be suitable for many purposes of indoor application. Another is the simplest form of Edison lamp. The Swan and Maxim ornamental lamps show some of the various home uses to which they are applied. In Edison's mining lamp, the outer glass vessel in which the lamp is contained is nearly filled with water, and consequently all the connections are under water, so that there is no danger of fire from choke-damp. A ring of lead is fitted over the upper part to prevent the lamp floating upwards.

EDISON'S "FARADAY" DYNAMO-GENERATOR.

The Edison lamps at the Crystal Palace are supplied with electricity by his "Faraday" generator, of which there are several at work, the name being given in honour of the great physical philosopher, Professor Michael Faraday.

THE ANGLO-AMERICAN "BRUSH" ELECTRIC LIGHT.

The Brush Company and the Hammond Electric Light and Power Supply Company, who also adopt the Brush system, have a much larger space allotted them than any other system. The Brush Corporation lights up the Tropical Department and the adjoining Alhambra and Byzantine Courts. Their machine-room is close at hand, and contains five Robey engines, ranging from twenty to thirty horse power, driving a large number of generating machines. The light from their ordinary arc lamps has about the same luminosity as the majority of the other forms exhibited; but a marked feature about them is that while all the lamps supplied by any one machine are in one circuit, an accident extinguishing one lamp does not affect the others beyond making their light a little brighter. The Pilsen lamps, which light the orchestra, and is almost, if not quite, as steady as the Brush lamps, is the only other system which has secured the right of using such a cut-out arrangement. The Hammond Company's lights are, if anything, steadier than those of the maternal company, and illuminates the corridor leading to the Brighton Company's station, and Messrs. Nicholson's costume-room. They have been asked, and it is understood have agreed, to light up some of the darker parts of the nave and the walk leading to the panorama in the grounds. The most powerful light in the Palace is shown by the Brush Company, and is said to equal in power the light of 150,000 candles, the carbon rods being 2½ inches in diameter. Such a light is only adaptable for such purposes as lighthouses, &c.

KELWAY'S ELECTRIC LOG.

This apparatus provides for a continuous registration, on board the ship, of the actual distance travelled by her through the water. The distance run is shown on dials placed in the captain's cabin, and elsewhere; each indication being also announced on a single-stroke electric bell within audible distance of the officer on watch. The electric log, which has received favourable attention from the Admiralty, seems calculated to be of service in navigation, scientific speed trials of vessels, nautical surveying, the testing of various forms of screw propellers, and in naval range finding. The Kelway's Electric Log screw or rotator, which actuates the electrical portion, is placed in a cylinder below the bottom of the vessel where, by a passage of the vessel through the water, it rotates in a body of water of uniform pressure or density, thus eliminating, even in the roughest weather, the well-known inaccuracies of ordinary towing-logs, which are notably affected by the disturbing influence of the ship's propeller or by surface waves. Fig. 1 shows the interior of the Electric Log. At its lower part is a sluice-valve bolted to the bottom of the vessel; the sluice valve is shown open and allowing the sea full access to the iron box DD. This iron box is bolted to the upper flange of sluice-valve, and is closed at its top by the metal plate E, which effectually prevents the ingress of water to the ship's hold. Through the stuffing-box F, in plate E, passes the metal rod G, the screw-thread on which raises or lowers the metal cage HH. To the bottom of this cage is affixed the cylinder, having its opening for the passage of water in a fore and aft direction or in a line with the keel of the vessel. The passage of water through the cylinder causes the screw R to rotate with the spindle L. On this spindle is also an endless screw which revolves, by the intervention of a wheel, the vertical spindle M, which in its turn actuates a series of wheels in the box N. The last of these wheels, termed the "mile" wheel, makes one revolution while the vessel passes through the water one nautical mile. On the spindle of this "mile" wheel is affixed a second wheel, having eight ratchet teeth; and these teeth, by moving a lever, cause an electric circuit to be completed—obviously eight times in the mile, the current passing through the electric cable to the indicating dials and bells. Referring to the dial, fig. 2, it will be seen that there are eighty graduations on the outside circle; and, as the pointer in front of the dial jumps one graduation at each completion of the electric circuit, one revolution of the larger pointer represents ten miles. Ten revolutions of this pointer cause the smaller one to make one revolution, recording one hundred miles. The mechanism of this dial is similar to a gas-meter index.

SUBMARINE MINES.

A feeling somewhat akin to revulsion pervades us as we look at this collection of destructive appliances exhibited by the War Office. The mines, more generally known as torpedoes, contain, when loaded, charges of gun-cotton, which in some of the larger forms amounts to 500 lb. Generally there is an arrangement inside the mine by which, when it is severely shaken, as it would be when a ship strikes, rings a bell on shore to warn the officer in charge of what has taken place. He can then explode the mine by means of an electric current generated by fifty or sixty Leclanché cells. Sometimes an arrangement is adopted by which the mine is exploded automatically. When the charge does not exceed 100 lb. the mine is usually floated on the surface of the water, but larger ones are sunk to a depth not exceeding fifty or sixty feet; a leaden weight holds them down, while a buoy prevents them from sinking too far. It is calculated that a charge of 500 lb. placed 50 ft. below the surface will, when exploded, eject into the air a column of water 150 ft. high and 80 ft. in diameter. Of course, when the mine is below the surface the circuit-closing or warning arrangement above referred to is contained in the buoy.

MILITARY MOUNTAIN TELEGRAPH.

This is another War Office exhibit, and is of exceptional interest, as it depicts the way in which telegraphic communication may be hastily established. The insulated wire which is to form the conductor is wound on drums large enough for two of them to constitute a mule's load. All the tools and instruments are contained in cases similar to those with the wire drums. In the exhibit there are three model mules laden and ready to start. Where the ground permits, the load is drawn on a carriage built for the purpose, each carriage carrying six miles of insulated wire, besides the tools, &c., required for laying and working the line. A tent is also carried which constitutes the telegraph office.

CHANDELIER OF THE ELECTRIC LIGHT AND POWER GENERATOR COMPANY.

This is by far the most tastily designed glass electrolier yet exhibited. It was made by Messrs. Defries and Son, of Houndsditch. Ninety-six Maxim incandescent lamps, each of about thirty-candle power, are arranged on it, the effect being very grand, yet not without a tone of delicate softness. The power is supplied by the Maxim dynamo, which requires between eleven and twelve horse power.

THE CHANNEL TUNNEL.

We present a series of Sketches and Illustrations of the Channel Tunnel Works at Dover, recently commenced by the Submarine Continental Railway Company, of which Sir Edward Watkin, Bart., M.P., Chairman of the South-Eastern Railway Company, is the presiding director. On Saturday, the 18th inst., Sir Edward Watkin conducted a party of thirty or forty gentlemen from London to inspect these works, the Lord Mayor of London being one of the party. They descended the shaft, walked a thousand yards under the sea, and admired the working of Colonel Beaumont's compressed-air boring machine. They had the electric light, by which the tunnel was illuminated from end to end. In anticipation of this visit Sir Edward had directed a luncheon to be prepared in the tunnel, which was partaken of in a chamber cut in the side of the heading, tables and stools being set there for the occasion. This chamber is subsequently to be converted into a siding. The party spent upwards of an hour in the tunnel, and then went to Dover, where a luncheon, to which the Mayor and some of the members of the Dover Corporation had been invited, was provided at the Lord Warden Hotel.

The Channel Tunnel was again opened to another party of London visitors on Tuesday of last week, when Sir E. Watkin could not be present, but his place was taken by Mr. Miles Fenton, general manager of the South-Eastern Railway, aided by Mr. Shaw, Secretary to that Company. Under the guidance of Mr. Francis Brady, C.E., engineer of the Channel Tunnel, and Colonel Beaumont, R.E., the visitors, six at a time, having put on rough overalls to save their clothes from dust, descended into the shaft by means of an iron cage, such as is used in coal-mines. The shaft is sunk in the chalk cliff at the foot of the "Shakespeare Cliff," between Folkestone and Dover, and is about one hundred and sixty feet in depth. The opening is circular, with boarded sides, and the descending apparatus is worked by a steam-engine. At the bottom of this shaft is a square chamber dug in the grey chalk, the sides of which are protected by heavy beams; and in front is the experimental boring, a low-roofed circular tunnel, about seven feet in diameter, the floor of which is laid with a double line of tram-rails. This tunnel is admirably ventilated, and on visiting days is lighted with electric lamps, the steam-power at the mouth of the shaft being sufficient for all purposes. The stratum through which the experimental borings have been made is the lower grey chalk. This material, while perfectly dry, and very easily worked, is sufficiently hard to dispel any apprehensions of crumbling or falling in. The main feature of the Channel Tunnel scheme, as designed by the engineers of the Submarine Continental Railway Company, is that of constructing the tunnel altogether in the lower measure of the grey chalk. In this respect it differs from the scheme of a rival Company, whose tunnel would reach the lower measure of grey chalk two or three miles eastward of Dover, necessitating an approach through the white chalk, which is heavily charged with water, and from which stratum, in fact, the town of Dover gets its water supply.

The length of the Submarine Continental Railway Company's Tunnel, under sea, from the English to the French shore, will be twenty-two miles; and, taking the shore approaches at four miles on each side, there will be a total length of thirty miles of tunnelling. The approach tunnel descends from the daylight surface by an inclosed gallery, with an incline of 1 in 80, towards Dover, to a point on the Southern Railway Company's line, about two miles and a half from Folkestone. The exact point is at the western end of the Abbot's Cliff tunnel, at which point the gault clay outcrops to the sea level. Half a mile of heading has been driven, by machinery, from this point; after which, the works were suspended, to enable them to be resumed at a point nearer to Shakespeare's Cliff, where the tunnel passes under the sea. It is the shaft at this point that is represented in our Engraving. This shaft is 160 ft. deep. It is sunk close to the western end of Shakespeare's Cliff. The opening is situated on a plateau, formed by the debris which was blown down by the famous blast that took place in the construction of the South-Eastern Railway between Folkestone and Dover, some years ago. The shaft passes through about 40 ft. of overlying debris; it then just touches the white chalk, which is pervious to water; after which it goes down to the beginning of the tunnel, which is here 100 ft. below the surface of the sea. The small amount of water observed in the shaft above, when the party of visitors descended, came from the white chalk already mentioned. A heading, now three quarters of a mile long, has been driven in the direction of the head of the Admiralty Pier, entirely in the grey chalk, near its base, and a few feet above the impermeable strata formed by the gault clay. The idea of the projectors is so to localise the tunnel, not only in the part already made, but also when it passes out under the sea, that it shall have the body of the grey chalk above it, and that of the gault clay below it; both these strata being in themselves impervious to water, and both alike having heavily watered strata on each side of them; namely, the white chalk, as shown in our Section, above the grey chalk; and the lower greensand below the gault clay. This condition, together with that of providing sufficient roof between the top of the tunnel and the sea, which roof has a thickness of 150 ft., will necessitate the tunnel being turned in a curved line.

The present heading is 7 ft. in diameter. Machinery is being constructed by which this 7 ft. hole can be enlarged to 14 ft., by cutting an annular space, 3 ft. 6 in. wide, around it. This will be done by machinery similar to that already described, but furnished with an upper bore-head, suitable for dealing with chalk, to make an annular cutting, instead of acting like the first machine, which makes the 7 ft. cutting. The one machine will follow the other, at a proper interval; and the debris from the cutting by the first will be passed out through the second machine. The compressed air, likewise, which is necessary to work the advanced machine, will be similarly passed through the machine coming behind. There will be no difficulty in speeding the machines so that they shall work along the tunnel at the same rate of progress; and the larger machine can, as well as the smaller one, do its work with a minimum of manual labour; only two men are at present needed for each machine.

At the end of the tunnel the visitors found one of the Beaumont and English compressed-air boring machines at work. The length of this machine from the borer to the tail end is about 33 ft. Its work is done by the cutting action of short steel cutters fixed in two revolving arms, seven cutters in each, the upper portion of the frame in which the borer is fixed moving forward 5-16ths of an inch with every complete revolution of the cutters. In this way a thin paring from the whole face of the chalk in front is cut away with every turn of the borer. A circular tunnel is formed having a diameter of 7 ft. A man in front shovels the crumbled debris into small buckets, which, travelling on an endless band, shoot the dirt into a "skip" tended by another man. The skip when filled is run along a tramway to the mouth of the shaft. At present these trolleys, each holding about one third of a cubic yard, are drawn by men; but before long it is hoped that small compressed air-engines will be used for traction. The rate of progress made with the machine is about one hundred yards per week, but will soon be much accelerated. As worked at present, the number of revolutions it makes is two or three per minute, which, as the advance by each revolution is 5-16ths of an inch, amounts to boring nearly an inch a minute while the machine is at work. But Colonel Beaumont anticipates no difficulty in making the machine cut its way at the rate of 3-8ths of an inch per revolution, and getting five revolutions per minute, which would give a rate of advance of two inches per minute. A very important question has been raised with regard to the supply of compressed air. Carried in four-inch iron pipes, it now reaches the machine with a pressure of about 20 lb., the pressure at the compressor at the shaft mouth being from 30 lb. to 35 lb.; but by increasing the diameter of the supply pipe to eight inches the loss of working value by friction would be greatly diminished, if not rendered inappreciable. The boring has now advanced to the length of 1250 yards, or say, three quarters of a mile, and it is going on at the rate of three miles a year, which speed of working, as we said, will be increased. Simultaneous borings from the French side at the same rate would give six miles a year, or a complete tunnel underneath and across the Channel in three years and a half. The geological experts associated with the project are sanguine about the existence of a great bed of grey chalk, which stretches in an irregular curve from England to France, starting from the foot of the Shakespeare Cliff, and reaching to a point on the French coast a little to the east of Cape Grisez. This bed has been penetrated on the English side, but not as yet on the French side.

The shape which the completed tunnel will assume will probably be a circle, 14 ft. in diameter, but flattened at the bottom to receive the rails. It will be lined with 2 ft. thickness of cement concrete; not that this is necessary to ensure the stability of the work, but to prevent accidental falls of chalk. The concrete will be made of shingle from Dungeness, and of cement formed from the grey chalk excavated from the tunnel itself. In this manner, the tunnel will afford the means of its own lining at a cheap rate. The gradients will be 1 in 80, on each side, until the depth 150 ft. below the bottom of the sea is reached; after which the line may be said to be level, subject only to a very slight inclination from the centre outwards, to prevent the lodging of water.

The ventilation of the tunnel is, perhaps, the simplest matter in connection with it, but as some doubts have been expressed upon this, it may here be shortly explained. During the construction of the tunnel, the air necessary for ventilation will be more than enough supplied by that used to drive the boring machines. This air will be conveyed, from the pumping-engines at the shore ends, to the centre of the tunnel, by means of cast-iron pipes of 8 in. or 10 in. diameter. When the tunnel is opened for traffic, the trains will run through by means of Beaumont compressed-air locomotives. The principle of these locomotives will be similar to that of those already working on the Stratford and Leytonstone branch of the North Metropolitan Tramways. The Channel Tunnel locomotive will weigh from sixty to seventy tons, and will be charged with 1200 cubic feet of air, compressed to the density of seventy atmospheres, the equivalent of which is over 80,000 cubic feet of free air. This will give power sufficient to draw a train of 150 tons gross weight (including the engine), the distance of twenty-two miles under the sea. Assuming that the rate of travelling be thirty miles an hour, the air discharged by the engine would give a supply of free and pure air to the amount of 2000 cubic feet, approximately, which will be far in excess of what is needed by the passengers in the train.

The margin of power belonging to the locomotives will be sufficient to provide for any accidentally increased demand upon them. But to provide against the possibility of any inconvenience arising from the engine having in itself no recuperative power, there will be pipes, containing compressed air at a pressure of 1000 lb. to the square inch, laid along the tunnel, and kept constantly charged. Reservoirs will also be placed, at convenient intervals, so that the engines, should they need it, may be replenished with compressed air, more quickly than an ordinary steam locomotive can be re-charged with water. It will, therefore, be seen that Colonel Beaumont's system of compressed-air engines affords equal advantages with the ordinary steam locomotives, and with no increase of weight. An illustration of the compressed-air locomotive is given at page 213 of this number of our Journal.

One of the Views engraved, in a military sense, shows how the tunnel is defended by existing works; this view is taken from the head of the Admiralty Pier. The approaches to the tunnel here appear to be completely under command of the guns of the fortress. The proposed railway station, on the site of the works, at the west end of Shakespeare's Cliff, will be directly under fire of the 80-ton turret guns on the Pier, and also from ships on the sea. The arrangements for flooding or otherwise blocking the tunnel will be under control from the fortress, through the shaft which is shown at the east end of the Shakespeare's Cliff tunnel. The air-compressing station will be on the cliff above the railway at that point; and it is to be observed how completely this is commanded both from the sea and from the Pier, and also from the guns of the fortress. It is proposed also that the mouth of the tunnel and the hydraulic lift shall be commanded by guns, in casemates to be excavated in the solid cliff behind the station; these guns would be protected by iron shields, and their position, while it would afford a close and direct fire on the tunnel's mouth, could be made absolutely secure against escalade.

The controversy now going on between different military authorities and politicians respecting the effect which the Tunnel would have upon our insular safety from the risk of a foreign invasion has already been much noticed. In the Nineteenth Century for March, Colonel Beaumont replies to the arguments of Admiral Lord Dunsany and of a distinguished military man, understood to be Sir Garnet Wolseley, who disapproves of the Tunnel upon this ground. Having been himself employed three years in the construction of the Dover fortifications, Colonel Beaumont is enabled to assure us that by the natural strength of the position, and by the powerful works erected there, at a cost, including the turret at the end of the Pier, somewhat under a million, Dover may be regarded as "a first-class fortress, quite safe from any coup de main from without." He assumes that the entrance to the Tunnel will be under the command of guns mounted in a strong outwork, and also under fire from the sea; and that a communication, by a small gallery and shaft, will be made between the point where the heading passes under the sea and the interior of the works. There will be arrangements, under control of the military, for letting the water of the sea into the Tunnel; but these arrangements, which will be kept secret, should be of such a nature that they cannot be tampered with improperly, while they can be promptly put in operation without the assistance of technical experts. The position of the inclined gallery, connecting the end of the Tunnel with the main railway lines, will be such that the trains, on emerging from under the sea, must be lifted bodily, by suitable hydraulic apparatus, to the daylight surface; and without the aid of such hydraulic apparatus, the ends of the Tunnel will be blocked, in such a way as not to be reopened for some time. Hence it will be evident that, supposing a party of two thousand men could pass through the Tunnel by surprise, and could reach the bottom of the shaft at the Dover end, they could surely get no further. "The inclined gallery is blocked; and to be lifted to the surface would require the assistance of the lift for a long continuance of time; while, if the inclined gallery were open to them, they would only emerge to find themselves under the guns of the fortifications; and, unless they could take Dover from the outside by a coup de main, they would be utterly unable to control the Tunnel in the slightest degree." But Colonel Beaumont does not admit that it is possible for a surprise party of two thousand men, as imagined by Lord Dunsany and his military authority, to pass through the Tunnel unobserved. "They cannot come by train; as, irrespective of any suspicions on the part of the booking clerks, special train arrangements would have to be made to carry so large a number; they cannot march, as they would be run over by the trains, running, as they would do, at intervals of ten minutes, or oftener, without cessation, day or night." He proceeds to answer the objection, that the arrangements for blocking the Tunnel might not be available when required, or that the persons in charge of them might be incapable. The provision that he would think needful would be two or three 6-inch iron mains, laid from the sea direct into the Tunnel; each main furnished with stop-valves, duplicated to render an accident absolutely impossible; and the keys to work these stop-cocks should be in charge of the officer of the guard. No dynamite mines, submarine batteries, and secret wires, would be needed. He thinks arrangements should also be made by which the ventilating engines, used for the ordinary purposes of the Tunnel, could pump the smoke from their own furnaces into the Tunnel, in place of fresh air; this could be easily and simply done, and would soon produce an atmosphere through which no living being could pass. Colonel Beaumont then asks, how is it possible for such arrangements to miscarry? The only supposition deserving to be considered is that of Dover itself being captured by an enemy, so that the mouth of the Tunnel, with its approaches, would be in the enemy's hands. If we had lost command of the sea temporarily, and the enemy had landed twenty or thirty thousand men on our coast, there would still have been time for us to block or flood the Tunnel, or to destroy its ventilation; at any rate, to destroy the hydraulic lifts, which could be done by firing a single charge of dynamite. The enemy, if he had command of the sea, could bring over troops and supplies as well without the Tunnel as with it. But if we regained the command of the sea, the Tunnel would be of no avail to the enemy; for both its approaches, the open mouth and the lift, would be under fire of our ships, and a few shells would render it impossible to use the Tunnel at all. "It would appear, therefore, that at the only time when, by any stretch of imagination, the Tunnel would be a source of danger, no invader could by any possibility make use of it."

"To sum up my arguments," says Colonel Beaumont, "I submit that absolute conditions of safety are secured, if, in the construction of the Tunnel, the following conditions are observed:—

1. The mouth of the Tunnel to be outside the fortifications of Dover, and under fire of its guns.
2. The entrance to the Tunnel, whether by lift or inclined gallery, to be under command of fire from the sea.
3. The works to be capable of being flooded, or otherwise stopped, from a point within the fortifications."

The third annual show of the English Cart-Horse Society was held on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday at the Agricultural Hall. The entries were considerably in excess of those of any previous year. The Prince and Princess of Wales visited the show on Tuesday.

ROYAL INSTITUTION LECTURES.

MECHANISM OF THE EYE.

Professor McKendrick, in his sixth lecture, given on Tuesday, Feb. 21, continued his account of the physiology of vision. He described the structure of the various coats of the eye, and in particular that of the retina. He then contrasted the structure of the complete eye with that of the compound eye, found in many invertebrate animals, showing that there are many points of resemblance between them. He next considered the eye as an optical instrument, and illustrated, both theoretically and experimentally, how the image is formed on the retina, and showed the necessity of accurate focussing on the retina by a demonstration on the screen of the experiment of Scheiner. A description was given of the peculiarities of the normal eye—the near-sighted and the far-sighted—and it was stated that most eyes are more or less liable to certain other defects, such as that due to the curved surfaces of the refractive media being unequal, and thus producing “a stigmatism.” The Professor described the error in regard to colour, termed “chromatic aberration,” because the eye is unable to focus equally for the rays of the spectrum, more especially for those at the extreme ends, the violet and the red. After alluding to the entoptic phenomena of the eye—the dots, streaks, and curious figures sometimes seen floating in the air—Dr. McKendrick showed how we may be made conscious of phenomena in the retina, and even see the shadows of the retinal vessels of our own eyes.

GEOGRAPHICAL DISTRIBUTION OF ANIMALS.

Mr. P. L. Sclater, Ph.D., F.R.S., Secretary of the Zoological Society, in his second lecture, given on Thursday, Feb. 23, after recapitulating the division of the earth's surface in regard to terrestrial animals into six principal regions, proceeded to discuss the peculiarities of the Australian region. This region he showed to be divisible into four sub-regions, the Australian proper, the Papuan (New Guinea), the Maorian, and the Polynesian. These were taken successively, and their special characteristic forms, in mammals and birds, pointed out. The forms selected as typical of the Australian region were the duck-bill, kangaroo, wombat, honey-eater, lyre-bird, and cassowary. Mr. Sclater also explained the meaning of the lipotype, or characteristic deficiency in certain faunas, and instanced as Australian lipotypes monkeys, ungulates, woodpeckers, and vultures. Special reference was made to the late Mr. John Gould's great work on the Mammals and Birds of Australia, justly celebrated for the accuracy and beauty of the plates. After noticing the similarity of the Papuan fauna to that of Australia, Mr. Sclater passed to that of New Zealand, the Maorian, so remarkable for the absence of mammals, for the wingless bird, the apteryx, and for the fossil remains of the extinct gigantic bird, the moa or dinornis. The lecture concluded with a brief account of the Polynesian fauna. During the lecture allusions were made to the successful rearing of kangaroos and other animals in the Zoological Society's gardens.

THE CHEMICAL ALLOTROPY OF BRODIE.

Professor Odling, F.R.S., who gave the discourse at the evening meeting on Friday, Feb. 24, began by referring to the opinion, which prevailed up to mediæval times, that there was only one primordial matter, and that the substance of all things was the same, the form alone being different. In conformity with this notion, the alchemists strove to impress upon the substance lead the form of gold, and thereby to convert it into gold. This was followed by the apposite idea that difference of form or nature depended wholly on difference of substance, and that identity of substance necessitated identity of properties. Since 1823 bodies began to be discovered of precisely the same composition, possessing strikingly different properties. To express the relationship of various sets of bodies, alike in composition but different in properties, Berzelius, in 1831, and later on, introduced the words “isomerism, polymorphism, and allotropy.” The last term was used expressly to denote the different conditions of so-called elementary bodies. An account was then given by the speaker of the allotropic forms of carbon, phosphorus, and oxygen, and of Sir Benjamin C. Brodie's researches in connection with these several elements. Particular reference was made to his transformation of a mass of phosphorus, by means of a fragment of iodine, into a substance differing more widely from ordinary phosphorus than lead differs from gold. Professor Odling next discussed Sir B. C. Brodie's inquiries into the nature of allotropy, which resulted in the establishment of the now accepted notion that the element hydrogen is a compound of hydrogen with hydrogen, while oxygen is a compound of oxygen with oxygen, and similarly in other cases. In regard to the relationship of ordinary oxygen with ozone, Sir B. C. Brodie demonstrated that the former is constituted by the union of two atoms, the latter by the union of three atoms of oxygen. Finally, Professor Odling discussed certain speculative views, which these researches suggested, as to the true nature of the elements. The discourse was illustrated by interesting experiments.

THE MYTHOLOGY OF HOMER.

Mr. Watkiss Lloyd began his second lecture on Saturday last, Feb. 25, by describing and illustrating the development of Greek mythology by free, unrestrained use of the imagination. He then commented on the relation of the Homeric mythology to the overwhelming religious sentiment which recognises a great intelligent sympathising power, or powers, behind all the forces of nature—a momentous feeling which underlies all forms of worship, and which, more especially in early ages, tended to the use of poetic forms of expression. The mythology adopted and embellished by Homer, Mr. Lloyd said, had already forfeited this simple religious character; and he cited the pious Herodotus as a witness to the conventional religion of his time, and of its slight connection with Homer's gods and goddesses. In reference to Welcker's theory that Homer was the first to advance beyond the barbaric forms of religion, by combining the attributes of humanity with the elemental powers of nature, Mr. Lloyd demonstrated that in Hesiod and Homer we have not the first awakening germs of mythology, but the extreme ripeness, which led to a revulsion and a reaction, and return to the ancient simple religion of Dionysius and Demeter, especially at Athens and Eleusis. This revival was heightened by the development of mysteries. Mr. Lloyd adverted next to the spirit of morality which pervades the Homeric poems, independently of their mythology, and concluded by correcting some strange misconceptions in this respect, and by repudiating some disparaging reflections on the character of the poet himself.

Mr. Joseph W. Swan will give a discourse on Electric Lighting by Incandescence at the Friday evening meeting on March 10.

Concurrently with the visit last Saturday of the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh and the formal commencement of the electric exhibition, the seventeenth annual bird show was held at the Crystal Palace, and continued till Thursday evening. The terrace saloon was filled with over 1200 specimens of sweet-voiced songsters and brilliantly plumaged creatures.

CHESS.

SACRE (Louth).—You have overlooked that if White play 1. R takes P in No. 1979, Black's answer is 1. R to K R 7th (ch), &c.

J. R. W.—Your question was answered last week.

C. S. (St. Cook, Albion).—We should have thought a bookseller would have been glad to dispose of his wares. Staunton's “Theory and Practice” may be obtained from Virtue and Co., London; and Gossip's “Manual” from Longmans and Co., London. The other books named are, possibly, out of print.

E. P. W. (Southampton).—The best reply is 7. Q to Q Kt 3rd, and should Black then play 7. Kt to R 4th, the usual continuation is 8. B takes P (ch), K to B sq; 9. Q to R 4th, K takes B; 10. Q takes Kt. The variation leads to an even game.

The twenty-ninth annual meeting of the City of London Chess Club was held on the 22nd ult., when the report of the committee was read and adopted, and the officers for the ensuing year were elected. The report proves that the club is steadily prospering. There has been a large accession of members during the past year, and the financial statement shows a satisfactory surplus. The following gentlemen were elected officers—Vice-President, Mr. H. F. Gastman; President, Messrs. Howard and Lovelock; Treasurer, Mr. Robert Clarke; Honorary Secretary, Mr. George Adamson; Committee, Messrs. Atkinson, Black, Cutler, Foster, Green, Long, Manning, Pizzi, Redpath, and Suelbel. The distinction of honorary membership was conferred on Messrs. Blackburne, Collins, Duffy, Delannoy, Harwitz, Healey, Horwitz, Macdonnell, Mason, and Moffatt.

The design of "Chess Practice," by Mr. H. E. Bird, appears to be to set before the student of chess the first ten moves in all the principal openings that have been adopted by masters of the game in practical play. Most of the examples have been selected from a compilation of "Chess Masterpieces" by the same writer, published some years ago, but a sufficient number has been taken from matches and tournaments played during the last eight or nine years to impart some novelty to the present work. How far such a book as "Chess Practice" can be regarded, in the author's words, "the safest guide to the learner" is extremely doubtful. If the "learner" limits his study to "Chess Practice," he will, without doubt, be "spared the perplexity attendant upon wading through the diversified opinions of the various authors of books on the chess openings;" but he will, we venture to think, acquire no knowledge of the principles of chess play. The "learner" will learn little worth knowing from being informed that, in a game between A and B, certain moves occurred in the opening. This would be to teach him chess as a parrot is taught to speak by sound, signifying nothing. We do not think, however, that Mr. Bird seriously pretends to teach the "learner" in this book, and shall not, therefore, pursue the point further. The most interesting part of the book is the Record of Tournaments and Matches during the last forty years; but some of these, described as having been played prior to the London Exhibition of 1851, were played a long time afterwards. Löwenthal, for instance, never visited this country until after the tourney of 1861 had been commenced; and Mr. Campbell's match with the late Mr. Barnes was not played until about 1857. About the same time, we believe, a match was played at Pursell's, in Cornhill, between Messrs. Bird and Falkbeer, which is omitted from the list. This match was played for a nominal stake only, but it evoked much interest and some controversy at the time, and was certainly not unimportant. Several other matches are omitted from Mr. Bird's record, as Steinitz giving Pawn and move to Devere, and at least one between Mr. Wisker and Mr. Macdonnell. "Chess Practice" is published by Sampson Low and Co., Fleet-street.

WILLS AND REQUESTS.

The will (dated Oct. 14, 1881), with two codicils (one dated the same day, and the other Nov. 16 following), of Mr. James Butler, of the firm of Hedges and Butler, wine merchants, 153 and 155, Regent-street, late of No. 14, New Burlington-street, and of Hollywood, Wimbledon Park, who died on Jan. 7 last, was proved on the 17th ult. by James William Butler and Frank Hedges Butler, the sons, William Worsfold, and Alfred Coleman, the acting executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £103,000. The testator leaves to his wife, Mrs. Frances Mary Butler, £3000, and his furniture, plate, effects, horses and carriages at Wimbledon and New Burlington-street, and he makes no further provision for her, as she is already amply provided for; to his son James William, £15,000; to his son William, £5000; to his sons Frank Hedges, Samuel, and Harry, £3000 each; to his daughter Mrs. Ellen Stilwell, £5000; and to his daughters Mrs. Fanny Coleman, Mrs. Mary Ann Cato, Mrs. Eliza Hewitson, Mrs. Harriet Cato, Miss Florence Butler, and Miss Alice Butler, £3000 each. In addition to these pecuniary legacies, there are gifts of freehold and leasehold properties to several of his children. Every clerk, shopman, carman, porter, boy, indoor and outdoor servant in his own employ or in the employ of his firm receive legacies varying from £10 to £200; and there are some other legacies. The residue of his property, real and personal, the testator gives to all his children, except his son George Killingworth, who went abroad and who had not been heard of for many years. Special provisions are made for maintaining and carrying on the deceased's businesses in London and Brighton.

The will (dated April 29, 1881), with a codicil (dated Nov. 5 following), of Mr. Osgood Torkington, late of Holly Lodge, Clapham Park, who died on Dec. 13 last, was proved on the 16th ult. by William Williams and Henry Robert Jackson, the executors, the value of the personal estate being over £48,000. The testator bequeaths £2000 Consols to the Royal Albert Orphan Asylum, Bagshot; and £1000 Consols each to the East London Hospital for Children, at Ratcliffe-cross; the Royal Hospital for Children and Women, Waterloo Bridge-road; the National Refuge for Homeless and Destitute Children, 25, Great Queen-street, Holborn; the Royal National Life-Boat Institution, John-street, Adelphi; the Hospital for Epilepsy and Paralysis, Portland-terrace, Regent's Park; the Metropolitan and City Police Orphanage, Strawberry-hill; the Evelina Hospital, Southwark Bridge-road; the Samaritan Free Hospital for Women and Children, Lower Seymour-street, Portman-square; the London Homoeopathic Hospital, Great Ormond-street; the West London Hospital, Hammersmith-road; Victoria Hospital, Gough House, Queen's-road, Chelsea; the North-Eastern Hospital for Children, Hackney-road; the Hospital for Women, Soho-square; Miss Sharman's Orphanage, 14, Smith-street, Southwark; the Bible Society, 146, Queen-Victoria-street; and the Chest Hospital, City-road. All these legacies are given free of duty, and the deceased expresses a wish that they shall not carry votes, presentations, or letters of recommendation. The testator also bequeaths £50 to the Clapham Dispensary, Manor-street, Clapham;—£6666 13s. 4d. Consols, upon trust, to pay the dividends to his niece, Emma Clayton, for life, and at her death to divide the capital sum between the Metropolitan Free Hospital, Commercial-street East; the Cancer Hospital, Brompton; the Royal Free Hospital, Gray's-inn-road; and the Westminster Hospital, Broad Sanctuary;—£6666 13s. 4d. Consols, upon trust, to pay the dividends to his niece, Clara Worger, for life, and at her death to divide the principal sum equally between Charing-cross Hospital, Middlesex Hospital; St. Mary's Hospital, Paddington; and the Great Northern Hospital;—£3333 6s. 8d. Consols, upon trust, for his niece, Eliza Dinah Torkington, for life, and then for the North London or University College Hospital; and St. Mark's Hospital, City-road;—£3333 6s. 8d. Consols, upon trust, for his niece, Susannah Francis Gleeson, for life, and then for King's College Hospital, Portugal-street; and Poplar Hospital, East India Dock-road;—£5000 New Three per Cents, upon trust, for Selina Smith, for life, and then to be divided between the Westminster Ophthalmic Hospital, King William-street; the Royal Orthopaedic Hospital, Oxford-street; and the Children's Hospital, Great Ormond-street;—and other legacies. The residue of his property he leaves to his niece, Eliza Dinah Torkington.

The will (dated Feb. 25, 1880) of Mr. George Jenner, late of Tuffon House, Layton-road, Hastings, who died on Nov. 26 last, was proved on Jan. 30 last by John Noakes and Mrs. Frances Sarah Jenner, the widow, the executors, the value of the personal estate exceeding £38,000. The testator gives to his wife his household furniture and effects and certain shares; a freehold farm to his nephew George Traiton Jenner, subject to annuities to testator's brothers Traiton and Charles; and legacies to his brother Edward Percy, nephews, nieces, and others. The residue of the personality is to be held upon trust for his wife for life, and then for his nephews and nieces, the children of his brothers Traiton and Charles.

The will (dated Oct. 6, 1877), with a codicil (dated Aug. 30, 1879), of Mr. Thomas Peake, coal and ironmaster and tile manufacturer, late of Brampton Lodge, Newcastle-under-Lyme, Staffordshire, who died on April 22 last, at Great Malvern, was proved on Jan. 27 last by John Nash Peake, the son, and Samuel Bate, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to more than £35,000. The testator leaves to his wife, Mrs. Harriet Nash Peake, £1000, and Brampton Lodge, with the furniture and effects, and £1000 per annum for life; to his son Thomas and his daughters Harriet and Fanny, £1000 each; to each of his four children, John, Thomas, Harriet, and Fanny, £400 per annum during the life of his wife; and the residue of his real and personal estate upon trust for his four children.

The will (dated Nov. 19, 1878) of Colonel Cecil William Forester, formerly Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms to the House of Commons, but late of Adamston, Wroxham, Salop, who died on Dec. 6 last, at Sheriowe, High Ercall, in the same county, was proved on Jan. 26 last by the Rev. Henry Charles Russell and Admiral Robert Fanshawe Stopford, the executors, the personal estate exceeding in value £33,000. The testator, after giving annuities to his sister and to his housekeeper, and legacies to friends and servants, leaves the residue of his property upon trust for his brother, George Townsend Forester, for life; at his death he gives £2500 to the Westminster Hospital, Broad Sanctuary; £2000 to the County of Salop Infirmary;—£1000 each to the Hospital for Consumption and Diseases of the Chest, Brompton; the Church Pastoral Aid Society; the Church Missionary Society; the British and Foreign Bible Society; and the Royal Hospital for Incurables, Putney;—£500 each to the London Orphan Asylum, Watford; the Western Dispensary, Broadway, Westminster; the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews; the London City Mission; the Army Scripture Readers' Society; and the Royal Cambridge Asylum for Soldiers' Widows, Kingston-on-Thames; and the ultimate residue to Admiral Stopford.

THE THEATRICAL SEASON at MONACO, 1882.

Two Troupes are engaged at the Theatre-Opéra for Operetta and Vaudeville (the Troupe of the Bouffes Parisiens, Paris), the direction of which has been intrusted to Mr. Plunkett, Ancient Director of the Palais Royal.

The other, the Italian Opera Troupe, is conducted by M. Jules Cohen, of the Academy of Music.

The following is the Programme of the Representations:—

Saturday, March 11, AMLETO, by Meadames Albani, Schalchi, and Messrs. Faure and Norvelli.

Tuesday, March 14, AMLETO, LUCIA, or FAUSTO.

The Opera of "Fausto" will always be played with the extraordinary distribution of Meadame, Faure, and Madame Albani.

After March 15 a Series of Brilliant Concerts will terminate the season.

It will be the first appearance of M. Faure in the rôle of Ashton in "Lucia," and also for the first time that Mr. Meadame will sing Rigetto.

These celebrated artists have never appeared together in any theatre.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, MARCH 11, 1882.

For the fifth time during her long and exemplary reign Queen Victoria has been mercifully preserved from the bullet of the would-be assassin. It is just ten years since an outrage of this kind was perpetrated, and it might reasonably have been hoped that her Majesty, in the autumn of her days, in her blameless life of comparative seclusion, and in circumstances that could not draw perilous public attention to her movements, would have been spared further cruel personal assaults. Once more, however, it is grievous to record, the life of our beloved Queen has been in danger from a half-starved, morbid, and crazy creature, whose bullet, fired from a revolver while her Majesty was leaving Windsor Railway Station on Thursday evening last week, we are happy to say, missed its aim, or rather was turned aside by the presence of mind of some Eton boys. As on former occasions of a like nature, the Queen manifested that "serene courage" which has always been characteristic of her bearing as a woman and a Sovereign in great emergencies; and it is matter for devout thankfulness that, on this trying occasion, her Majesty's nerves were, as stated by Earl Granville in the House of Lords on Monday night, "unshaken after what might well have tried the nerves of the strongest man." It has been some alleviation of public feeling to know that Maclean, the miserable criminal in this case—if, indeed, he can be regarded as accountable for his actions—was not in any sense associated with political grievances or discontent.

The whole civilised world hastened with a singular unanimity and in every available form to express abhorrence of the deed, and heartfelt sympathy with her Majesty on her happy escape. It is touching to read the messages of lively congratulation, couched in terms of affectionate veneration for our illustrious Sovereign, that have flowed in from every capital of the civilised world, as well as from all sections of her loyal subjects at home and abroad. These congratulations have come from the Czar, who still mourns the terrible catastrophe of which his Imperial father was the victim; from our American kinsmen, whose attachment to the Royal lady that mingled her sympathies with those of Mrs. Garfield when her distinguished husband was stricken down, vies with our own; and—not to multiply illustrations—from the Chinese Minister, who, like other Ambassadors, went in person to Downing-street to give expression to his feelings of concern. These endless manifestations of profound interest in the safety of our Queen are the offspring of a chivalrous respect and admiration such as no crowned head has ever elicited. Not only is her Majesty the senior of all the Sovereigns of Europe, but her consistent and exemplary bearing as the constitutional Head of the State; her unwearied devotion, under all circumstances, to the duties of her exalted position; and her unsullied domestic life during a reign which embraces nearly half a century of British history, invest Queen Victoria with a legendary pre-eminence that has not hitherto been known in modern times—we might say, in the annals of mankind. It is matter for devout thankfulness that the outrage of last week was of a character that is not likely to provoke imitation; and all sections of her Majesty's subjects will cordially unite in the hope that the quiet and repose of the chalet at Mentone, which will next week be her temporary home, may obliterate all the ill effects of last week's shocking incident.

Another week has elapsed without any definite understanding having been established between the two Houses of Parliament as to the scope of the Select Committee which the Peers have appointed to inquire into the working of the recently-passed Irish Land Act. Notwithstanding the overwhelming vote of the Commons last week against the preliminary issue rashly raised by Sir Stafford Northcote, their Lordships show no disposition to accept the Prime Minister's proposal to formally exclude the judicial decisions of the Land tribunals from investigation. Indeed, the Committee have already begun their inquiry, and the debate on Mr. Gladstone's resolution at the time we write "drags its slow length along," and is only sustained by the wearisome ingenuity of third-rate orators. Parliament has been a month in Session, and public business is sadly in arrear, while the discussion on the Procedure resolutions and the innumerable amendments on the First Rule, has yet to be taken. Legislative activity is at present represented by the renewed exclusion of Mr. Bradlaugh, and by the progress of a Post Cards (Reply) Bill. The House of Commons has, it is true, sat till the small hours of the morning more than once during the past week, not, however, to discuss the measures of the Session, but to listen with exemplary patience to the objections raised by the Land League members against sundry Supplementary Estimates that have a bearing on the Irish policy of the Government, and the position of the inmates of Kilmainham prison.

The week's record of brutal outrages in Ireland has been agreeably relieved by the report of Mr. Forster's visits to the disturbed districts. The Chief Secretary unites in a remarkable degree the moral courage which is needful for a statesman occupying so responsible a position and the traditional philanthropy which instinctively shrinks from needless bloodshed. Within the last week he has made a tour through the county of Clare, where ruffianism of the most brutal character has been in the ascendant. At Tulla, he visited the farmer Moroney, who, with his sons, was shot by some miscreants for paying his rent, and has since died, and a sub-constable, who was wounded by an armed party, and who has been promised promotion for his gallant conduct. Subsequently, Mr. Forster went to the turbulent town of Tullamore, where he not only walked through the streets alone, and had interviews with all kinds of people who had influence with the misguided population, but addressed a large crowd outside his hotel in his own fearless and pointed manner. To this promiscuous audience the right hon. gentleman announced that he had come to see things for himself, and enable him the better to perform his duty, which was to save men from outrage, to free them from intimidation, to leave them at liberty to earn their living as they chose, and to pay their lawful debts. The Chief Secretary did not mince matters in his unique speech. He told his hearers that he was resolved to put down outrages, and that although there might be bad landlords, that was no excuse for incendiarism, for maiming and killing men and animals, and for bringing ruin upon those who wanted to pay their just debts. He explained that a law was now in force which equitably reduced rents and gave tenants security for the fruits of their labours; and he promised that as soon as outrages had fairly ceased in Ireland and men were not ruined, maimed, or murdered for doing their duty, the suspects would be released. These brave and outspoken remarks were listened to with attention, and to a great extent cheered. At all events, the people admired Mr. Forster's courage, and were throughout good-natured. The incident is a rare and striking illustration of the moral influence that may be exercised by a man of great pluck and resolution upon a misguided mass of people, who, though they have warm hearts, have been poisoned by prejudice and unworthy passion. Mr. Forster prophesied that in five years the Land Act would bring about a most beneficial change. There is no doubt that, as the Irish Solicitor-General said in Friday's debate, many thousands of cases have already been settled by the Courts, and an almost equal number by private arrangement. But the urgent necessity of the hour is that a measure of which some Ulster Conservatives have described as the charter of Irish tenant farmers shall not be frustrated in its practical working by the unseemly intervention of the House of Lords.

Prince Milan has entered the charmed circle of Royalty, no doubt with the tacit assent of the Courts of Europe, and without asking leave of the Sultan, once the Sovereign, then the Suzerain, and now only the neighbour of Servia. When the Prince of Roumania assumed a crown, it was inevitable that his smaller but not less ambitious neighbour should follow suit. Neither Russia nor Austria could afford to put a veto on Prince Milan's aspirations. The Servians are of the Slavonic stock, and their country is of too much importance from a geographical point of view for the Czar to object to its being transformed from a principality into a kingdom. On the other hand, it suits the purposes of Austria, with an obstinate insurrection raging on the frontier, to conciliate a sturdy population that could give material aid to the Bosnians and Herzegovinians. Western Europe can well afford to look complacently at the pacific creation of any number of independent States out of the territory of the moribund Turkish Empire, and would decidedly prefer to see—as it may see ere long—Bulgaria absorbing Eastern Roumelia, and erected into an independent kingdom, rather than the reappearance of the spectre of the Eastern Question with a possible great war "looming in the distance." The cession of the wide and classic plains of Thessaly to Greece, which has been so worthily celebrated during the last few days by the Greek residents of London and their British friends, and the creation of the kingdoms of Roumania and Servia, are not only signs of the decadence of European Turkey, but are serious obstacles to the consolidation of Russian influence in the Balkan region, and a kind of guarantee of the independence and progress of communities which, less than half a century ago, languished under Ottoman misrule.

One of the pleasantest manifestations of the universal sympathy with her Majesty the Queen—sympathy awakened by the atrocious act of the Young Wretch Maclean—has been the alliance of American with British signatures to the Address of Congratulation agreed to at the meeting in the Anglican Church of the Rue d'Aguesseau of the British residents in Paris. It was the Rev. F. J. C. Moran who opened the proceedings and read some of the prayers appointed for the 20th of June; the Rev. J. A. Mackay, of the Avenue Marbœuf Church, who moved the Address, and Mr. Hely Bowes who seconded it. On the motion of the Rev. Mr. Gibson the Address was, of course, unanimously adopted; and then, at the suggestion of Mr. Yeatman, "who spoke of the Queen's prompt and lasting sympathy with the recent sorrow of the American people, and of their reverence and admiration for her," it was agreed that American signatures should be added to the others.

This is not by any means the first time that the Americans have affirmed their salutary conviction that blood is a great deal thicker than water, and have acted accordingly. Englishmen who are sojourning in the United States on the Fourth of July, and hear the Declaration of Independence read, are constrained to listen to a good many hard things concerning King George the Third; but you may traverse the American continent in its whole length and breadth—you may journey from New York to San Francisco, and from the Gulf of Mexico to Alaska, without hearing one unkind or discourteous word uttered touching Queen Victoria. And engraved portraits of our Gracious Sovereign are scattered all over the States.

As for the Young Wretch, people are saying that he is demented, and even that he has already been the inmate of a lunatic asylum. Whether he be mad or not it will be for the experts to argue, and perhaps for a jury to determine. We are not a bloodthirsty people; and although, if the Wretch be pronounced sane, he certainly deserves hanging as high as Haman, I cannot help thinking that if the entire public were polled (both sexes, mind) there would be an immense majority, not in favour of the Beast's swinging, but in favour of his being found guilty on some charge short of high treason, and which would warrant his being locked up for a term of years, and his being, periodically and at least three times, soundly flogged during his incarceration. I don't say that this is my opinion; still, I dare say that it is the opinion of a great many thousands of intelligent and normally humane persons. There may be something in the old Anglo-Saxon maxim that a criminal should be made "to pay with his hide."

Mem. : Many years ago—twenty, I should say—I paid a visit to Bedlam, and of what I saw there I wrote a detailed account in this Journal. The then Chief Physician of Bethlehem Hospital was the late Dr., afterwards Sir Charles, Hood, a most accomplished and benevolent gentleman. At the period of which I speak criminal lunatics (now sequestered at Broadmoor) were confined in Bedlam; and I made the visual acquaintance of several noted murderers, who had been acquitted on the ground of insanity. One was Dadd, the parricidal painter, who was busy at work over a picture of "Oberon and Titania." Another was Edward Oxford, the feather-brained potboy who shot at the Queen in 1840, and who seems to have been in one sense a kind of monomaniacal Mr. Toots; for the police found among his papers a number of letters, of a highly eulogistic nature, written by himself to himself.

Dr. Hood told me that he held Oxford (who was a quiet, civil, handy fellow about the Asylum) never to have been out of his mind at all, save with discard vanity; and that the ex pot-boy himself would often remark that the very best treatment to have adopted in his case would have been, not to try him for high treason, or lock him up as a lunatic, but to have given him a good horse-whipping.

“A dark house and a whip” was the Shakspearean prescription for the treatment of mad folk. It was a respectably ancient remedy. There was kindly sent me, some time ago, a very curious little volume, entitled “A Chronology of Medicine, Ancient, Mediæval, and Modern” (Lon. : Baillière, 1880), and in a chapter headed “Anglo-Saxon Leechdom” (p. 75), I light on the following:—

For joint pain—sing nine times this incantation thereon and spit on the joint, "Malignus obliuavit; angelus curauit; dominus saluauit." It will soon be well with him. If a man be lunatic—Take a skin of mercurine or porpoise; work it into a whip; swing the man therewith: soon he will be well.

But Pinel and Esquirol, Charcot and Forbes Winslow have long since abrogated this "heroic" mode of treating the insane. Still more curious is an assertion made by the old French physician, Bodin, in his "Théâtre Universel de la Nature" (Lyons, 1587), that, "at an hospital for lunatics in London called 'Nazaret' (obviously Bethlehem)" it was customary to scourge the mad people every fourteenth day of the moon in order to subdue their tendency to frenzy; and that the same custom prevailed at the Hospital of St. Restitut, at Soissons, and at that of St. Mathurin in La Beauce." Mediæval mad people had, evidently, a very bad time of it.

But it is a mad world, my masters. That is about the one thing that is certain in a whole ocean of uncertainties. "We are apish in it; and every place is full of metamorphosed and two-legged asses." I was much moved to read, the other afternoon, in the St. James's Gazette (the study of which is a joy for ever) that our very Government have gone crazy. "But, whatever course," says the St. James's, writing about the Commons' vote of censure on the Lords, "Mr. Gladstone may choose to adopt, of one thing we are persuaded—he will not persist in pressing the resolution of which he has given notice for this evening. If he does, then it will be pretty clear that the Government has lost its head completely."

This is truly shocking to hear of. Think of her Majesty's Ministers, when the Session has at last come to an end, departing en masse on board a steamer bound not for the Ship Hotel, Greenwich, but for Anticyra! But a direr announcement followed, a few days afterwards, in the St. James's. "The truth is," wrote the Sage, "that this is not a Cabinet of business men." Of course it is not. Mr. Gladstone, in particular, cannot be a man of business. His inexperience is lamentable to think of. It was only in 1831 that he made his entrance into official life as a junior Lord of the Treasury. 1834! The day before yesterday. Mr. Forster, too, is a mere baby in business. He is sixty-four years of age, and has been a worsted manufacturer; a notoriously unbusiness-like class of people. Mr. Goschen knows nothing about finance; Mr. Chamberlain would faint if you talked to him about business; and Mr. Mundella never heard of it. Mr. John Bright has not the slightest idea of how a carpet is woven; and Lord Granville would not be eligible for the post of corresponding clerk in a merchants' counting-house, for he cannot even speak French.

The gallant Colonel of Engineers and the other gentleman, of whose projected attempt to cross the Channel in a balloon I spoke last week, have made their attempt and have failed therein signally. I am heartily glad that the courageous aeronauts were providentially picked up by the Calais steamer, and thus rescued from a watery grave; but I am not at all sorry that the rash enterprise has collapsed. Had the aeronauts succeeded, what benefit to the (so-called) science of acrostation could have resulted therefrom? I asked the question last week, and ask it again now. It was not necessary to demonstrate the possibility of crossing the Channel in a balloon. It has been so crossed several times. It was crossed by Blanchard and Jeffries nearly a hundred years ago; when ballooning itself was in its infancy. It was crossed by the Duke of Brunswick. It was crossed by Lieutenant Gale in 1850. The poor Lieutenant soon afterwards fell out of the car of a balloon (near Bordeaux, I think), and his body was found some days afterwards in a wood, and half devoured by dogs.

I have seen in my time a great many accidents by flood and field; and I hold it to be a wicked as well as a foolish thing for men wantonly to imperil the lives with which they have been intrusted in order that they might be useful to themselves and to other people. But there is a silver as well as a golden side to every shield; and it may be that in my aversion from what may be termed Quixotic ballooning I am pig-headedly prejudiced. That is quite possible. When a very young man I was commercially interested in ballooning, and lost my money. I wrote a lecture on aerostation, and poor Gale, who delivered it, went with it on a tour through the provinces. Our exhibition (notwithstanding the immense attraction of the model of an aerial machine which positively—by means of two wires and some clockwork—flew on wide waving wings from end to end of the lecture-hall) didn't pay. Finally (I have alluded to the circumstance before), some thirty years ago I went up in a balloon; and the big bag burst when we were a mile high, and we came down by the run. Non amo te, Zubide. "I do not like thee, Doctor Fell"—I mean Doctor Montgolfier.

The fashions. Be not alarmed. There is no desire on the part of the Distressed Compiler to bore you with a renewal of the Treves lecture or the dress controversy of last week. But, looking out some books for the binders lately, I came across a little volume called "How to Dress, like a Lady, on Fifteen Pounds a Year." By a Lady. Inside the flyleaf did I paste a cutting which I had just made from a Paris newspaper, giving a list of feminine wearing apparel supplied at the Grands Magasins du Louvre, and in which a lady could be dressed de pied en cap, for the ridiculously small sum of twenty-four francs thirty centimes. Here is the schedule; only please observe that, my name not being Peeping Tom, I have lumped the underclothing together as lingerie :—

I asked an expert in costume whether this "arrangement in cheapness" could be carried out in England. I was answered, with some asperity, that the thing might possibly be done, not for four-and-twenty francs thirty centimes, but possibly for thirty shillings, by suffering creatures whose husbands were Brutes. The bonnet with satin strings for one shilling and fourpence was pronounced quite feasible. There are bonnets and bonnets. Who does not recollect the Japanese "three-farthing bonnets," which were so fashionable at Brighton a few seasons since? The gloves at thirty-five centimes still, however, I confess, stagger me. Could you, in London, purchase the flimsiest "arrangement in thread" for threepence-halfpenny?

The cheapest ladies' gloves of a really elegant and tasteful nature that I have ever met with were those which they used to sell at Naples. They cost a lira, say ninepence-halfpenny, a pair, and ladies generally bought them by the gross. They were of a very soft and glazed kid, and were of all the colours of the rainbow. The lady had these gloves worn on by her maid (for the buttons were rather "risky"). They only served for a single morning or afternoon or evening wear; and if the lady did not tear them off her hands when she came home, the gloves performed the havi kari on their own account, and ripped themselves up, so to speak, spontaneously.

On Saturday, March 4, took place at Willis's Rooms the banquet of the Greek Committee, held to celebrate the carrying out of the provisions of the Treaty of Berlin with regard to Greece, through the arbitration of the Great Powers, and the peaceful cession by Turkey to the kingdom of the Hellenes of the fertile region of Thessaly. The Earl of Rosebery took the chair at the banquet; and some two hundred noblemen and gentlemen, many of them Greeks, were present.

One of the London dailies which hates the Greeks and their cause with amusing intensity, and is equally "too too utterly" in love with the Turk, remarked in a pleasantly sub-acid article on the proceedings at Willis's Rooms, that the destinies of Greece would not be materially affected by "flatulent declamation at public banquets seasoned by quotations from Byron." This gratuitous insult to the speakers at the dinner exhibits as much ignorance as it does spite. It happens that I was present at the dinner, and listened attentively to the interesting speeches delivered. They were certainly not "flatulent"; and, as it chanced, although one right hon. gentleman incidentally cited a line from Homer in the original, nobody quoted Byron.

I have rarely known Lord Rosebery speak better. He called upon the company to drink to "The Prosperity of Greece" in an address full of quiet eloquence. The venerable Earl of Shaftesbury proposed, with really wonderful vigour, the health of the King of the Hellenes; to which the respondent was M. Genuadius, the Greek Chargé-d'Affaires, who expressed himself fluently and forcibly in pure and idiomatic English. Another Greek gentleman, M. Valieri, also made a capital speech; as did also Lord Dalhousie, the Right Hon. Shaw-Lefevre, and Mr. Arthur Arnold, M.P. When the Hellenic-hating Jingoos can get together as good a batch of orators as those who met at Willis's last Saturday, I will undertake, as the reverend gentleman did in "Pickwick," to "eat my hat, and swallow the buckle."

The Ful-staff Club, on the embellishment and general installation of which a great many thousands of pounds have been expended, and the organisation of which has given an exceptionally hard-working committee an immensity of trouble, has at length become a realised fact. The club-house in Covent-garden, artistically decorated, splendidly furnished, and in all respects handsomely and comfortably appointed, is now open for the inspection of members, and will so continue open until the thirteenth instant. On the fourteenth there will take place a Soirée Musicale and entertainment in the great hall of the club, to which a large number of guests—ladies as well as gentlemen—will be invited; and afterwards the club will be permanently open to members. The committee intend to bestow constant and indefatigable pains to secure artistic excellence in the cuisine of the club; and the chef is a cordons bleu (you see I have given up the contention that only female cooks can be cordons bleus) who has earned distinction at the Café Anglais, and at the famous (and alas! now disestablished) Philippe's, in the Rue Montorgueil, Paris.

The following is from the World :—

Does Mr. Furnivall still desire that note be taken of the first appearance of new words? I read in last week's Saturday Review that "Pavid correspondents sent their views to the Spectator," and further on I find it written of "W. Huntingdon, S.S.," that, "in spite of Macaulay's sneer," the reviewer is "inclined to regard him as a capable autodidact." Pavid is good. Autodidact is better.

"Pavid" is, of course, from the Latin "pavidus," fearful, timorous. But there is also the Italian word "pavido." I have an indistinct notion of having met with "pavid" somewhere as an English word; and I should not be in the least surprised were "pavid" to turn up in the "Fairie Queene," or in Fairfax's "Tasso," or in the "Anatomy of Melancholy." But one cannot re-read Spenser, Fairfax, and Burton through between the hours of ten a.m. and noon on Wednesday.

Respecting another word which has excited in its time much angry controversy, I have made within the last few days a little discovery. At least I hope that it is a discovery; but word-hunting is, in these days, a pursuit so eagerly followed that my small scrap of treasure-trove may be claimed by dozens of Dryasdusts more industrious and more perspicuous than I am. The word in question is "Humbug."

Now, in the first edition of Hotten's Slang Dictionary, 1785 was given as the earliest date at which the word could be found in print. The later editions of Hotten (London : Chatto and Windus) state that "Humbug" is to be traced back half a century earlier. Looking over some rare old etchings the other day, chiefly devoted to merciless pictorial abuse of the illustrious William Hogarth, I came on one in which Hogarth (caricatured with the legs of a satyr) is busy at his easel, painting three horrible "Blowsabellas" as the Three Graces. Beneath the etched lampoon appear some spiteful verses, of which I append the "tag":—

Deformity herself his figures place ;
She spreads an ugliness on every face ;
He then admires their Ellegiance (sic) and Grace.
Dunce connoisseurs extol the author Pugg,
The senseless, tasteless, impudent HUM-BUGG.

Ferdinando Killigrew's "Universal Jest-Book" (about 1735-40) gives "Humbug" as one word; but "Hum-Bugg" may be, after all, the elder form of the term.

Do you remember a somewhat animated discussion concerning the adjective "reverend" as a prefix to a clergyman's name? I picked up, the other day, a quaint old folio, published during the Protectorate. This is "The Complete Christian Dictionary," begun by "that Famous and Worthy Man of God, Mr. Thomas Wilson, Minister of the Ward at St. George's, Canterbury, and one of the See Preachers there." No "Reverend" here, you see, in Oliver's time; but, perhaps, a slightly too liberal allowance of spiritual pride. "Curate," in the "Complete Christian Dictionary," is omitted altogether; and, as regards "Bishop," Mr. Wilson does not omit to tell us that the word first signified a Clerk of the Market. On the cuckoo the lexicographer is shockingly severe. "It's of all fowls the most unprofitable, fearful, cold, weak, and unthankful. It thinks its own voice most melodious." Cruel Mr. Thomas Wilson. I have sent the old tome with my love to Charles Reade, who, I hear, is writing the Lives of the Patriarchs of Scripture. What an admirable book it should be!

ATTEMPT TO SHOOT THE QUEEN: SEIZURE OF RODERICK MACLEAN.

THE LATE COUNTESS OF ESSEX, FROM A MINIATURE PAINTED IN 1820
BY THE LATE SIR W. J. NEWTON.—SEE PAGE 230.

ATTEMPT TO SHOOT THE QUEEN.

A pistol-shot was fired at the Queen's carriage when leaving the railway station at Windsor, upon her Majesty's return from London, at half-past five in the afternoon on Thursday week. The pistol was a revolver loaded with bullets, and the Queen's life was put in very great danger. We can scarcely express the feelings of horror, indignation, and shame that were excited in the hearts of all classes of people in the United Kingdom, in the Colonies and India, and in every foreign nation, by the news of this most infamous attempt, perpetrated against the best of Sovereigns, and one of the best of women; one who has deserved never to have an enemy in the whole world. The grief and anger which such an outrage must cause in every honest mind, not merely among the loyal subjects of her Majesty, but universally throughout civilised mankind, cannot be entirely removed by our gratitude for her complete escape from injury, and from a peril that might easily have proved fatal; we shall continue to feel much disturbed by the reflection that it was in the power of an obscure wretch, villain or madman, to come near taking that life which is so justly dear to us all. This consideration has led us to accompany the illustrations of last week's detestable incident with the reproduction from our Journal of several Engravings published upon former occasions of the same odious character during the past forty years, when our beloved and honoured Queen has been cruelly made the object of wanton personal assaults or murderous attacks, none of which, thank God! have inflicted upon her any serious hurt. It is a disgrace to humanity, as well as to England, that such actions should have been possible in a single instance, but human nature is capable of becoming infinitely depraved and morally disordered.

On Thursday of last week, her Majesty and Princess Beatrice, having been in London since Tuesday, went back to Windsor, setting out from Buckingham Palace at twenty-five minutes past four, escorted by a detachment of Life Guards and attended by the ladies and gentlemen of the suite. The Royal carriage was accompanied, as usual, by four outriders, and a detachment of the 2nd Life Guards acted as a guard of honour. As her Majesty drove through the courtyard she was greeted with loud and hearty acclamations. The route taken was up Constitution-hill, through Hyde Park to the Victoria Gates, and along Spring-street to Paddington Station. The precaution of placing additional policemen at various points on the line was observed, as is customary on the Queen's journey through the metropolis; but this is done chiefly with the view of regulating the traffic in the streets until the Royal carriage has passed, and preventing undue crowding at points favourable for spectators. All along the route people gathered to see her Majesty pass, and many a hat was lifted and many a cheer raised. At Paddington station the arrangements for the departure were complete. The streets leading to the station and the approaches to the entrance-hall were crowded with spectators, many of whom had been waiting for hours. Order was kept by all, the services of the metropolitan police on duty being hardly required to keep the way clear for the Queen to pass. Her Majesty's reception was enthusiastic; from the time the carriage, with the guard of honour, appeared in sight, until the train steamed out of the terminus the cheers were loud and frequent, and testified to the loyalty of the people. The interior of the station was kept by an extra force of men belonging to the Great Western Company, and the platform in front of the Royal carriages was covered with crimson cloth. Admission to the precincts of the building was by special tickets. The train consisted of the Queen's private saloon, another saloon carriage for the ladies and gentlemen of the Court—including the Duchess Dowager of Roxburghe, Viscountess Bridport, and Colonel Sir John Carstairs M'Neill—and a first-class carriage, two vans, and the engine. The Royal party were met by Captain Bulkeley, one of the directors of the company, and the Queen and Princess Beatrice at once walked through the Royal waiting-rooms to their saloon carriage. The train left Paddington at ten minutes to five, arriving at the Windsor station punctually at twenty-five minutes past five. A large concourse of spectators had assembled on the platform, which had been carpeted and railed off on each side of the Royal waiting-room. The Queen remained in the carriage a few minutes after it had stopped, and then walked across the platform through the waiting-rooms to the Royal carriage waiting in the station-yard. The carriage, which was drawn by a couple of grey ponies, was closed, the weather being very cold. Her Majesty and Princess Beatrice having taken their seats, the outrider started on his way to the castle, and the crowd left the platform for the station-yard in order to see her Majesty drive past. While cheers were being raised by the bystanders, a man, who was standing at the gateway of the yard, deliberately raised a pistol and fired it at her Majesty's carriage, which was fifteen yards distant. The shot did not take effect, and the carriage windows were instantly drawn up; the carriage was at once driven off in the direction of the castle, but stopped in High-street, opposite the White Hart Hotel, where the Queen summoned her personal attendant, Mr. John Brown, who was seated behind, to enter the carriage and tell her what he had witnessed of the affair. The carriage then went on to the Castle; but as soon as the Queen entered there she directed her Equerry, Sir John M'Neill, to return to the station and ascertain whether any person was hurt.

The man who had fired the pistol was instantly collared by Superintendent Hayes, chief officer of the Windsor police, assisted by Inspector Fraser, of the Royal Household police force, a detachment of the A Division, Metropolitan Police. The pistol was wrested from its possessor by one of the bystanders, Mr. James Burnside, a photographer; he is assistant to Mr. W. Carpenter, photographic artist, of Windsor. Two youths of Eton College, named Wilson and Robinson, who had been standing, with other Eton scholars, close behind the murderous assailant, flew at him with great fury, and one beat him fiercely over the head with an umbrella, till Inspector Fraser bade him desist. Mr. John Frost, foreman of the locomotive department at Slough, aided in securing the assassin. One of our Illustrations shows the manner of his capture. He was a young man, poorly dressed, who gave the name of Roderick Maclean, and his address at 84, Victoria Cottages, Windsor, where he said he had been a week. On being seized by the collar, he said, "Don't hurt me," and Inspector Fraser replied that they would not. The prisoner then said, "I have done it through starvation." They put him into a cab, and took him to the Windsor police station, the people in the street showing much excitement. At the police station Superintendent Hayes entered the case in the ordinary charge-book. Our Illustration of the scene here, with the prisoner held by two police-constables, may next be referred to. Sir John M'Neill and General Sir H. Ponsonby were present. One of the Windsor magistrates, Mr. H. L. Simpson, having soon arrived, the prisoner was formally charged by Superintendent Hayes with shooting at her Majesty the Queen with intent to do her grievous bodily harm. The Mayor of Windsor, Mr. Joseph Devereux, Mr. H. Darvill, Town Clerk, General Sir H. Ponsonby, Viscount Bridport, and Colonel Sir J. McNeill were present in the charge-room while the prisoner was being searched. Later he was examined in the cell by Dr. Holderness, who pronounced him sane.

After the prisoner had been searched by Inspector Fraser and Superintendent Hayes, the weapon, a medium-sized six-chambered revolver, described as of German make, was examined. It was found that two of the chambers still remained loaded with ball cartridges, and two had cartridges recently discharged, while the other two were empty. A paper containing fourteen ball cartridges of the same kind, with several papers and valueless articles, were also discovered upon Maclean, who said he should make no defence, but should reserve what he had to say till his examination.

It seems that Maclean, when he tried to shoot the Queen, was slightly in advance of the Royal carriage, and fired the revolver as it was approaching him. His action was perceived by Princess Beatrice, but not by the Queen. John Brown, the Queen's Scotch man-servant, was sitting in the rumble, and saw Maclean raise his hand and aim the revolver, which exploded as the carriage dashed towards the prisoner, the bullet from the weapon probably passing Mr. Brown and the upper part of the back of the carriage, and dropping in the station-yard. Her Majesty happened to be sitting on the right side of the back seat of the vehicle, the furthest place from the prisoner, who was to the left of the carriage when he fired the shot.

The bullet was found next morning, in the station-yard, by Mr. Joseph Turner, inspector of the permanent way of the Great Western Railway. It lay about thirty yards from the spot where Maclean stood when he fired the revolver; and the Queen's carriage must have passed between. The bullet seems to have hit a truck just beyond, and to have rebounded a couple of feet, being slightly flattened. No bullet mark was found on any part of the Queen's carriage. The horses were going only at a walking pace; and if the shot had been fired half a second before, the bullet would probably have struck either her Majesty or Princess Beatrice. It was, undoubtedly, a very narrow escape of life for either of those illustrious ladies. The assassin was prepared to fire a second shot, having actually turned the barrel of the revolver to join another loaded chamber after he fired.

As soon as the prisoner was secured, General Sir Henry Ponsonby sent a telegram to the Home Secretary informing him of what had happened. The Queen, at the same time, sent the following to her eldest son:—"From the Queen, Windsor Castle, to the Prince of Wales, Marlborough House.—In case exaggerated report should reach you, I telegraph to say that as I drove from the station here a man shot at the carriage, but fortunately hit no one. He was instantly arrested. I am not the worse." Immediately upon receiving this telegram, a message was returned to Windsor on behalf of their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, expressive of their thankfulness upon the happy escape of the Queen. The news at once spread through the metropolis, and the callers at Marlborough House were exceedingly numerous. Messages were received from the members of the Cabinet, the foreign Ambassadors, and other illustrious personages.

The Prince of Wales had made arrangements that night to visit the Court Theatre to witness the performance of "The Manager;" and he purposely carried out his intention in order to allay public anxiety. Being informed on his arrival by the manager that, in consequence of the report of the attempt on the Queen's life, some of the audience were leaving, his Royal Highness authorised him to state publicly that her Majesty felt no ill effects from what had occurred. The announcement was received with great cheering by a crowded audience, who greeted the Prince by rising in a body.

In every city and town of the United Kingdom, and in all the capitals of Europe, also in New York, Boston, and other American cities, the news was received with the same general feelings of mingled indignation at the crime, and joy for the preservation of the Queen's life. The Sovereigns and Governments of all foreign States lost no time next day in communicating to her Majesty's Government here, or to the British Ambassadors and Ministers abroad, their sentiments upon this occasion. In London, on the day after the incident, meetings of the Court of Common Council, the Metropolitan Board of Works, and other public bodies, were summoned to pass suitable resolutions; and this course was adopted likewise by the Municipal Corporations of most other towns in Great Britain.

In many churches and chapels on Sunday, the preachers made special reference to the event of two days before, and the National Anthem was played on the organ, if not sung by the congregation. Even on the London Stock Exchange, at three o'clock on Friday afternoon, "God Save the Queen" was sung by all assembled. On Monday morning, the scholars and students of Eton, conducted by the Provost, Rev. Dr. Goodford, and the Head Master, Rev. Dr. Hornby, were received by her Majesty in the Quadrangle of Windsor Castle, and presented an address to the Queen. Her Majesty has not in any way altered her usual habits while residing at the Castle since the attempt to kill her, but has daily walked on the Terrace, with her youngest daughter, and has enjoyed drives in the Park.

The prisoner, Roderick Maclean, was brought before the Mayor and Windsor magistrates on Friday, when Mr. Stevenson, solicitor to the Treasury, appeared for the prosecution. Sir James Ingham, the Chief Magistrate at Bow-street Police Court, was also present. The evidence of Superintendent Hayes, Mr. Turner, and Mr. Burnside, was taken; and the prisoner was then remanded, upon the charge of shooting with intent to murder the Queen. Roderick Maclean is twenty-eight years of age, and is of respectable family connections, and tolerably well educated, speaking French and German; but his conduct seems to have long been irregular and eccentric, and his family have turned him off, allowing him a very small weekly pittance. He has latterly been moving from one town to another, Weston-super-Mare, Croydon, Brighton, Southsea, and finally Windsor, leading an idle and aimless life, and in a state of beggarly poverty, though he could pay for his food and lodgings, which were of the meanest kind. A penny and three farthings were all the money found upon him when arrested. He had bought the revolver at Portsmouth for five shillings and sixpence. It is said that he was confined some months last year in the Wells Lunatic Asylum, Somersetshire, and once in a Dublin asylum. He now declares that he did not intend really to injure the Queen, but only "to alarm the public," as he says, "with the result of having my grievances respected, such as the pecuniary straits in which I have been situated." A letter, apparently just written in pencil, was found upon him, not directed to any person's address, but which ran as follows:—

"I should not have done this crime had you, as you should have done, allowed the 10s. per week instead of offering the insultingly small sum of 6s. per week and expecting me to live on it. So you perceive the great good a little money might have done, had you not treated me as a fool and set me more than ever against those bloated aristocrats ruled by the old lady, Mrs. Vic., who is a licensed robber in all senses."

RODERICK MACLEAN."

A photograph of the prisoner was taken by Mr. W. Carpenter, of High-street, Windsor, and is now sold by the London Stereoscopic Company, Regent-street. The portrait is given, with other Illustrations, on our front page.

This is the sixth time that an attack has been made on the person of our gracious Sovereign Lady Queen Victoria, who began to reign June 20, 1837, and whom God preserve! The first occasion was on June 10, 1840, on Constitution-hill, Green Park, where a young man named Edward Oxford fired a pistol at the carriage in which were seated her Majesty and Prince Albert. He was a waiter in a London coffee-shop. In his case a plea of lunacy was successful, and he was sent to Bethlem Hospital, but was afterwards removed to the Criminal Lunatic Asylum at Broadmoor, where he died a few years ago. The second attempt was on May 30, 1842, when her Majesty and Prince Albert were returning to Buckingham Palace in an open carriage from the usual afternoon drive. A young man, about twenty-five years of age, named John Francis, almost at the same spot where Oxford had fired his pistol, walked towards the Royal carriage and discharged a pistol at her Majesty. He was instantly seized, and the pistol, the barrel of which was still warm, wrested from him. He was tried on June 17 before Lord Chief Justice Tindal, Baron Gurney, and Mr. Justice Patteson, and was convicted of the crime of high treason. The Lord Chief Justice pronounced the full legal sentence on him, when he fell, fainting, into the arms of the gaoler. His sentence was afterwards commuted to penal servitude in Norfolk Island. On Sunday, July 3, in the same year, as her Majesty and Prince Albert, with the King of the Belgians, were driving from Buckingham Palace to the Chapel Royal, St. James's, a somewhat deformed youth named John William Bean, about eighteen years of age, presented a pistol at the Royal carriage in the Mall, and pulled the trigger, but no flash followed. The barrel contained some paper and a few grains of coarse gunpowder. This outrage led to the introduction of a bill by Sir Robert Peel, then Premier, to prevent those guilty of such offences as this from being invested with the dignity of traitors, and to visit them with condign punishment more suited to their criminal folly. It was, therefore, enacted that anybody wilfully producing or having any firearms near the person of the Queen, with intent to use the same to injure or alarm her Majesty, shall be guilty of a high misdemeanour, and be liable to transportation for seven years or imprisonment for three years; "and during the period of such imprisonment to be publicly or privately whipped as often, in such manner and form, as the Court shall order and direct, not exceeding thrice." It was provided that any attempt to strike or otherwise injure her Majesty should be treated in the same manner as if firearms had been used.

In May, 1850, only four weeks after the birth of the Duke of Connaught, a most cowardly attack, though unattended with serious danger to life, was perpetrated on the Sovereign by Robert Pate, an ex-lieutenant in the Hussars. As the Royal carriage was emerging from the gate of the Duke of Cambridge's residence in Piccadilly, Pate, who had been loitering in the neighbourhood, deliberately struck the Queen with a stick or cane, leaving a mark on her cheek and crushing her bonnet over the forehead. The Queen, speaking to the footman behind her, said, "Go on; I am not hurt." Pate was seized, and hurried away by the police. On his trial at the Old Bailey for the assault, a defence of insanity was set up, but was rejected by the jury, and the prisoner was sentenced to seven years' transportation, though whipping was omitted from the penalty.

Most recent of all these detestable outrages was that of the youth Arthur O'Connor, which took place on the last day of February, 1872. This can hardly be described as an attempt to assassinate her Majesty, for O'Connor's weapon was a rusty old pistol, with flint and steel lock, and was not even loaded; indeed, it could not have been fired with any amount of charge. In the barrel a piece of greasy rag was found. The crazy youth also had a knife in his possession. When the Queen was entering Buckingham Palace after a drive O'Connor presented himself at the side of the carriage holding the pistol in one hand, and a paper, which he wished the Queen to sign, in the other. The paper proved to be a petition for the release of the Fenian prisoners. Her Majesty exhibited no alarm, though it was, of course, impossible for her to know the harmless nature of the weapon presented at her until afterwards. The Queen was just as fearless on Thursday week, when she was really in great danger; and when the instances of President Garfield and of the late Emperor Alexander II. might justify some degree of alarm in the heart of a man, let alone a woman, bearing the highest rank, with all its personal risk.

Our Portrait of her gracious Majesty engraved this week, and placed in the centre of the Illustrations of those memorable attacks on her person, is from the recent photograph by Mr. J. Thomson, 78, Buckingham Palace-road.

THE LATE COUNTESS OF ESSEX.

Our Portrait of this lady, who died on the 22nd ult., in the eighty-eighth year of her age and forty-third of her widowhood, is copied, by permission, from a miniature on ivory, painted in 1820 by Sir W. J. Newton, Miniature Painter in Ordinary to her Majesty Queen Adelaide, and subsequently to her Majesty Queen Victoria, until his death in 1869. The late Dowager Countess of Essex was, previously to her marriage, known as Miss Catherine Stephens, a favourite vocalist and actress, who first appeared on the stage in 1813. In 1815 she surprised and delighted the town in "Romeo and Juliet," at Drury Lane. Her ballad singing during "the Regency" was renowned. On the stage genteel comedy was her forte, but she also gained high success in romantic plays drawn from Sir Walter Scott's novels. Miss Stephens quitted public life in the very height of her fame, and in 1838, shortly afterwards, was married to the fifth Earl of Essex, then in his sixty-eighth year, and who died April 23, 1839. He had been married before to Sarah, widow of Mr. E. Stephenson, and daughter of Mr. Henry Bazett, of St. Helena, but he left no children by either his first or second marriage. The Earldom of Essex, therefore, descended to his nephew, the sixth and present Earl, who attended his aunt's funeral, with others of the family and friends in Kensal-green Cemetery last week. It was impossible for the Countess to be buried with the late Earl, her husband, as the family vault of the Essex family, in Watford Church, near Cashiobury, the Earl's seat, has been closed some years past.

A CHILD OF POMPEII.

Eighteen hundred and two years ago, last August, the gay and luxurious Roman city of Pompeii, overwhelmed by an eruption of Mount Vesuvius, was buried in ashes and molten red-hot pumice-stone, from which its ruins are still but half excavated; and we now and then hear of some interesting discovery, but seldom of one more affecting to the sense of humanity than that which was made three weeks ago. In one of the narrow streets were found signs of human remains in the dried mud lying on the top of the strata of lapilli reaching to the second floor of the houses; and when the usual process of pouring plaster of Paris into the hollow left by the impression of a body had been accomplished, there came to light the form of a little boy, seemingly about twelve years old. Within the house, opposite to the second-floor window of which this infantile form lay, were found a gold bracelet and the skeleton of a woman, the arms stretched towards the child. The plaster form of this woman could not be obtained, the impression being too much destroyed. It is evident that the mother, when the fiery mass descended, had put her little boy out of the window in the hope of saving him, and he must, no doubt, have been overwhelmed. The position of the left leg, indeed, seems to show that the child had lost one foot, or that it had been hurt or lamed, which may have been done by the burning substance that quickly overspread the floors of the house and the pavement of the street. Some think the boy was actually being raised and carried in his mother's arms, at the moment when both finally perished. His left arm is close to the chest, as though wrapped in his toga or mantle, while the right arm (which has been broken off above the wrist, in digging out the figure) was somewhat uplifted. There is a protuberance on the face, which seems to have been caused by his putting a finger to his mouth, to clear it off the suffocating matter that pressed upon him in his last moments of life. The mother is supposed to have been a rich lady, seeing that she wore on each arm plain gold bracelets, each weighing about one ounce and a half. She also wore two massive gold finger-rings—one mounted with an emerald, whereon was engraved the horn of abundance. The other ring was an amethyst of a beautiful bright colour in fine state of preservation. On this was engraved, in most artistic style, the figure of Mercury, seated on a rock, holding his caduceus, or winged stick entwined with serpents, in one hand, and a purse in the other. We are indebted to Mr. J. Boyd, of Naples, for the photograph we have engraved.

THE CARNIVAL AT DÜSSELDORF.

Düsseldorf, in Rhenish Prussia, is one of the towns of Germany where the Carnival—partly from old associations and partly because there are a great many artists living there—is kept up with almost as much enthusiasm as in Rome. A very lively fancy-dress ball is held in the Townhall, under the auspices of the "Malkasten," or Artists' Club, on the Saturday before Lent. At this entertainment is represented, in the early part of the evening, a scene from mediæval times, every detail as to arrangement and dress being got up with the greatest care by the artists themselves. As there are about 20,000 people at the ball, in the costumes of all centuries and countries, the scene is one of great variety and brilliancy. This year, too, there was on Sunday a procession of art students through the streets of the town. The maskers represented a band of free lances and robber knights, who, after marching through the principal thoroughfares, made a raid on several waggons of Jewish merchants, Princes, and Princesses, with dolls as babes, and other harmless passengers; slaughtered and bound them, in a most theatrical manner, and then drove them back with the vanquished and the spoil. For three days of Carnival great festivity and fun prevailed in the town; there were numbers of the inhabitants going about the streets, and from house to house, disguised in all the costumes, genuine and ridiculous, that fancy can picture. There were to be seen Italian brigands, knights, clowns, warriors, jesters, Jack Tars, beggars, mountebanks, Indians, and many strange fellows with white hats, large check trousers, red whiskers, eyeglass, and mysterious book in hand, intended to represent the English tourists, each with his inevitable "Murray." Frequently was displayed a mixture of every kind of costume under the sun on the same individual. Noses and beards, of all sizes and shapes, adorned the faces of the maskers. Any solitary and unprotected female, meeting with some of these gay and festive youths, was liable to be kissed in a very summary manner; this being a privilege that the male sex expect at Carnival time. The little children all carried sticks, with which they would playfully thump passers-by to their hearts' content. During three days this festival was kept up with great spirit until Ash Wednesday, when serious occupations were resumed. We are obliged to Mr. W. L. Bogle for the Sketches and for this description of the affair.

Professor W. A. Hunter has resigned the Chair of Jurisprudence in University College, London.

The Lord Mayor opened a new high school for boys at Woolwich last Saturday afternoon, where he addressed the audience upon the necessity in this day of an advanced education. General Sir J. A. Adye presided; and among the speakers were Baron H. de Worms, M.P., and the Rev. Brooke Lambert, Vicar of Greenwich.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

A celebrated French General, who visited England towards the close of the Second Empire to take note of Things Military among us, remarked of the British Infantry of the Line, that it should be a matter of congratulation to foreigners that there were not more of the admirable soldiers in question. A compliment more outspoken has seldom been so delicately expressed. But a precisely converse conclusion may be arrived at by the critic of an exceptionally droll farce. You are far from glad; you are really sorry that there is no more of it. Does "Box and Cox" come to an end an instant too late? Would you quarrel with "The Birthplace of Podgers" were it prolonged to double its actual length? And who ever cried "Jam satis," at the end of "The Goose with the Golden Eggs." The inventors of the purely modern entertainment known as the "farceful comedy" are wise in their generation. They cater for a public who, in the way of fun and merriment, are not content with a short allowance of food for laughter, but, like Oliver Twist, "ask for more." They get more, much more at the Criterion Theatre, which has witnessed a long succession of triumphs in Comedy-Farce, or Farceful-Comedy, call it which you please, and which has scored a fresh and decided success in Mr. H. J. Byron's excruciatingly funny play of "Fourteen Days," which was produced at Mr. Charles Wyndham's pretty establishment last Saturday.

The piece, which the author, with commendable frankness, admits to be taken from the French of MM. Gondinet and Bisson, is in three acts, and is called on the programme simply a "Comedy." It is not the less essentially a three-act farce, or it might with closer propriety be termed an extravaganza, did not that last-named word inevitably suggest associations bearing on "topical" songs, "break-down" dances, and silk fleshings. "Fourteen Days" is not a comedy, because its plot is simply impossible; and the canons of dramatic art demand that in a comedy there should be coherence. As my object is to sincerely applaud and not to meticulously pick holes in one of the most humorous and well-acted productions that I have seen for a long time past, I will merely show that the plot is of the nature of a farce, and not of a comedy, by noting two incidents simply impossible of occurrence. One of the characters, a barrister, visits a gentleman who is suffering a term of fourteen days' imprisonment in "Hot Bath Fields." The barrister, who, to serve a purpose of his own, wishes to hold converse with the incarcerated gentleman, takes advantage of another prisoner taking a bath to slip on his, the prisoner's, clothes. The disguised barrister is subsequently mistaken by the gaol authorities for a real delinquent; he is locked up, and is not released from captivity until he is considerably more than half starved. Now all this, it is obvious, is so much sheer impossibility. The governor of a jail may furnish his house as he pleases, and invite what friends he chooses to visit him; but no person from the outside could, under any circumstances, penetrate to the prisoners' bath-room and attire himself in the prison dress. Again, the wife of the imprisoned gentleman (whom she imagines to be in Italy) calls on the governor of the jail, not knowing him to be such a person, and thinking that he is only an old friend of her husband. This is a literal impossibility. The governor's house must be inside the prison walls. At Newgate, indeed, the governor's street door opens into Newgate-street; but it is flanked on either side by a wing of the prison, and is, to all intents and purposes, part of the jail premises. Now such extravaganzas as these are not of the slightest moment in a farce. The "Wedding March" is an impossible farce; so, taken apart from the music, is "Trial by Jury;" but both are none the less droll for being delirious.

In Mr. Byron's "Fourteen Days," Mr. Peregrine Porter is an independent gentleman, who is really fondly attached to a pretty, ladylike, but somewhat prudish wife. He is as truthful and honourable a gentleman as need be; yet one trifling indiscretion into which he has fallen incites an Ironical Fate to impel Mr. Peregrine Porter to tell, during the major portion of three acts, a succession of the most alarming "crammers." He and his friend Mr. Brummles, a stockbroker, and old enough to know better, have been dining out at a fashionable restaurant, where they meet with two strange ladies, who have lost their purses, or never had any to lose. The gentlemen accompany the ladies to the theatre; but after the play, when Mr. Porter has handed one of the strange fair ones into a cab, he discovers that he has lost an unique photograph of his wife. He runs wildly after the cab; a policeman interferes with him, and in a moment of exasperation he knocks the constable down. For this he is charged at Bow-street, and sentenced to fourteen days' imprisonment. It seems, however, that he has got out on bail in the interval between the first hearing of the charge and the actual sentence; and during this period he concocts, with his friend Brummles, an artful scheme, by means of which Mrs. Porter is to be persuaded that her husband's fortnight from home has been passed, not in enforced seclusion in Hot Bath Fields, but in sunny Italy. In the interests also of this scheme he is compelled to break off a match between his sister-in-law, Fanny Simpson, and Arthur Spoonbill, a fashionable photographer, who has a rival in Timothy Glibson, a rising and certainly very flighty barrister. The second act is passed in the luxuriously furnished drawing-room of Mr. Claude Delafield, the governor of Hot Bath Fields House of Correction, a gentleman of strong musical, poetical, and æsthetic tastes, and a consummate donkey. This personage has accidentally become possessed of the unique photograph lost by Porter, and has painted a large portrait from it. When he learns from Glibson that the original of the photograph is the spouse of "Number Twenty-Eight," otherwise Peregrine Porter, he sends for that prisoner and captive (who presents a most ludicrous appearance in the prison garb), shakes hands with him, regales him on brandy-and-soda and cigarettes, and eventually persuades him to intrust him with a letter to his wife, with whom Mr. Delafield proceeds to engage in a questionable Platonic flirtation. The whole act is one string of absurdities, farcical equivokes, witty dialogue, and rollicking tomfoolery. In the last act, the scene of which, like the first one, is laid in Porter's house, all is made right again. Mrs. Porter, who has a bad attack of jealousy, gets over it; Mr. Porter "acknowledges the corn" as regards his fourteen days imprisonment, and is forgiven by his loving consort; Mr. Spoonbill, the photographer of "professional beauties," marries Fanny Simpson; Mr. Claude Delafield, æsthetic and equivocal Platonicist, judiciously "makes himself scarce"—I say judiciously, because Mrs. Porter's husband seems to be becoming ominously aware that he wears boots, and that those boots have toes; and Mr. Timothy Glibson will, it is to be hoped, find in rapid professional advancement (he has impudence enough to raise him to the highest ranks), consolation for his lack of success in the uncertain fields of Love.

It is not too much to say of "Fourteen Days" that the acting is as good as the piece, and that a funnier piece Mr. Byron has seldom, if ever, written. It is, from first to last, full of vivacity, erre, and "go." Extravagant as are many of the incidents, so skilfully are they contrived by the dramatist, and so artfully are they interpreted by the players, that the spectator wholly forgets their inherent impossibility; and even Mr. Claude Delafield, very cleverly rendered by Mr. H. Standing, appears a perfectly natural character. Mr. Charles Wyndham's Peregrine Porter was not only a highly amusing but a highly polished impersonation, reminding one, now of Charles Mathews and now of Sothorn, of neither of whom, however, can Mr. Wyndham be fairly called an imitator. He is as original as he is talented. Mr. W. Blakeley was insinuatingly oily as the gay old stockbroker, Brummles; and Mr. Lytton Sothorn threw plenty of comic energy into the part of the photographic and amorous Spoonbill. The agonies of hunger, only partially appeased by the continuous consumption of penny buns, were depicted in a most realistic manner by Mr. G. Giddens as Timothy Glibson; and Mr. A. Denison made as much as ever could be made of the trifling part of a peppery old Colonel of Engineers, who supercedes Mr. Delafield as governor of Hot-Bath-Fields. Miss M. Rorke was almost too gentle, refined, and graceful as Mrs. Peregrine Porter. Looking at the outrageous wildness of the entire piece, I should have preferred a purely farcical, or else a tragi-comic or "high-falutin" wife—a Xantippe, a virago, a screaming, fainting, whisker-pulling, Probate and Matrimonial Causes kind of wife;—a lady who "raised Cain and broke things." Miss K. Rorke was sparkling and attractive as Fanny Simpson; and the brisk impudence and untiring volubility of Mrs. Porter's maid, Tippetts, found an apt exponent in Miss E. Vining. Mr. Redwood gave all due stolidity to the part of Jones, a prison warder. Such, then, is "Fourteen Days," a decided triumph for its gifted author and the clever manager of the Criterion and his admirably assorted company.

At the Court Theatre "The Manager," for which some premature pessimists had rashly predicted the fate of Humpty Dumpty, has even, without the assistance of all the king's horses and all the king's men, succeeded in picking himself up again, very successfully indeed. The thoroughly laughable and wittily written piece is now running to excellent houses; and every night Mr. John Clayton is earning more and more golden opinions for his richly humorous rendering of Mr. Chiff, proprietor and manager of the Palladium Theatre. To equal advantage is Mr. Clayton seen in the delightful gem of a piece—Mr. D. G. Boucicault's comedietta of "My Little Girl," adapted from Messrs. Besant and Rice's excellent novel. The comedietta precedes "The Manager." Be in your stall early—even if you have to cut off your dinner at the first entrée—and see "My Little Girl." It is a most artistic, pathetic, and altogether symmetrical and interesting performance. A bon chat, bon rat. The acting is simply delightful. Mr. John Clayton as Hartley Vane, the kind-hearted, middle-aged bachelor, who has adopted a little waif and stray, who, when she has come to womanhood, passionately loves her, but who, in the noblest spirit of self-sacrifice, surrenders his treasure to his nephew, Bertie Durnford, to whom the girl has given her youthful affections, is as powerful as he is tender and true to nature. Mr. H. Kemble is exceedingly funny as a short-sighted curate, continually tumbling over articles of household furniture; Mr. D. G. Boucicault and Miss Measor, as Bertie Durnford and Gladys, make love very boyishly and girlishly; and Miss Carlotta Addison is a most dignified, judicious, and sympathetic Aunt Janet. It is a charming, touching, wholesome piece of work, as pure as a crystal, and both in its writing and its playing does honour to the modern stage.

MUSIC.

THE CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY.

The specialty since our last notice of the performances at Her Majesty's Theatre was the representation, for the first and only time this season, of Wagner's "Rienzi," in the English version, by Mr. J. P. Jackson, as produced by Mr. Carl Rosa in January, 1879. The opera was given on Monday evening, having been postponed from the previous Saturday afternoon in consequence of the sudden indisposition of Herr Schott, who filled the title-character here in 1880. He sang on Monday, still under the influence of illness, rather than cause a second postponement. Notwithstanding this disadvantage, Herr Schott gave the declamatory portions of his music with much effect, particularly the address to the people and that to the nobles, and the spirit-stirring Battle-Hymn; but was obliged to omit the Prayer in the last scene. He again looked the character remarkably well, his entry on horseback, in the third act, having been, as before, a striking feature. The performances of Madame Valleria and Miss J. Yorke, respectively, as Irene and Adriano, were excellent throughout; Miss C. Perry sang the solo of the Messenger of Peace with much grace; and other characters were well filled by Mr. W. Bolton (Paolo Orsini), Mr. Pope (Raimondi), Mr. G. Thomas (Baroncelli), and Mr. Snazelle (Cecco del Vecchio).

The opera is, as before, superbly mounted as to scenery, costumes, and splendour of pageantry and ballet-action; and the orchestral and choral details were throughout well rendered, Mr. Kamdegger having skilfully conducted the performance. It is to be wished that the work, so effectively given, could have been heard more than once here; the season terminating this evening without its second announcement. Perhaps, however, it may be repeated at the Standard Theatre, to which Mr. Rosa removes—for a fortnight—on Monday.

Another special event of this week was the return of Madame Schumann, who reappeared at the Popular Concert of Monday evening, and received an enthusiastic welcome from a crowded audience. The great pianist played—perhaps as admirably as on any previous occasion—her late husband's fine fantasia in C (op. 17); her appreciative interpretation of the poetical romanticism of which (especially of the noble middle movements), produced a very marked impression. Herr Joachim was again the leader of the string quartet party, the programme having concluded his performances of Bach's "Chaconne" in D minor, for violin alone. Vocal pieces were rendered by Miss Spencer Jones with much charm and grace.

Mr. Walter Bache's annual orchestral concert took place at St. James's Hall on Thursday week, when his programme consisted entirely of works by Franz Liszt, in whose claims to rank as a great composer Mr. Bache believes with a fervent enthusiasm that is by no means general. Of the extravagant eccentricity, amounting sometimes to frenzy; of the frequent incoherence and disregard of all structural form and development, which characterise most of Liszt's larger works, we have before spoken; moreover, as all the pieces given at Mr. Bache's recent concert had already been heard here, and commented on, specific detail is now uncalled for beyond stating the facts that the programme comprised: the Festival March composed for the commemoration of Goethe's birthday, at Weimar, in 1819—the "Mephisto Walzer" from Liszt's music in illustration of scenes from Lenau's "Faust;" and the wearisome "Faust" symphony occupying more than an hour in performance. All these were very finely rendered by an excellent orchestra ably conducted by Mr. Bache. The tenor solo in the symphony was well declaimed by Mr. B. Mettuckin, and the choral ending ("Chorus Mysticus") was efficiently sung by a choir of tenors and basses of almost eighty voices.

The last two Saturday afternoon concerts at the Crystal Palace have not presented any marked speciality calling for detailed notice. On the earlier occasion, Spohr's "Power of Sound" symphony and other orchestral pieces were finely rendered, Herr Hausmann gained great applause by his skilful execution of Signor Piatto's violoncello concerto in D minor, and Madame Patey contributed effective vocal performances. Last Saturday's programme included Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony; and Ries's pianoforte concerto in C sharp minor, the latter very finely rendered by Mdlle. Marie Krebs, who also played with great effect two unaccompanied solos. Other instrumental pieces and vocal arias contributed by Signor Foli completed the programme.

At the concert given on Tuesday evening at St. James's Hall—for the benefit of Princess Frederica's Convalescent Home—a "Requiem," composed by Herr Bonawitz, was performed, with full orchestra and chorus, the vocal solos having been well rendered by Misses A. Marriott and D'Alton, Mr. Shakespeare and Signor Foli. The work is very skilfully written, with much effective use of the learned forms of counterpoint, and a pervading tone of religious sentiment. Among several effective movements, the "Benedictus," for solo voices, was especially so. In this, the soprano is prominent; and Miss Marriott's refined singing and the efficient co-operation of her associates did full justice to the music. The "Requiem," indeed, was, throughout, very well rendered. It was conducted by the composer, who was greatly applauded at the close of its performance. In the second part of the concert—which was of a miscellaneous character—two pleasing movements of a pianoforte quintet, by Herr Bonawitz, were played by himself in association with a string quartet party consisting of the Brouil family. These pieces were also much applauded, as was Herr Bonawitz in his performance of Schumann's Pianoforte Fantasia in C and a Polonoise by Chopin.

The London Ballad Concert of this week included a selection of favourite songs by Mr. Arthur Sullivan.

The third of the series of concerts given at the Royal Albert Hall by students of the National Training School for Music took place on Wednesday afternoon, with a good vocal and instrumental programme.

The third of Mr. Henry Holmes's interesting "Musical Evenings"—at the Royal Academy of Music—took place on Wednesday, with an excellent programme.

The third of this year's concerts of the Philharmonic Society took place on Thursday evening, when the programme included the first performances in England of Brahms's choral ode, "Nanie," a new overture by Mr. F. Corder, with other interesting features.

Mr. Frank Elmore gave on Tuesday at the Eyre Arms Concert-rooms, St. John's-wood, the first of six ballad concerts; and concerts were given on Thursday by Madame Ida Bloch (pianist) at the Royal Academy of Music, and by Miss Lucy Riley (violinist) at Marlborough Rooms.

Haydn's "Creation" was announced for performance by the Sacred Harmonic Society yesterday (Friday) evening, with Miss M. Davies, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Signor Foli as solo vocalists.

The Scottish Musical Society is about to form a permanent orchestra for Scotland, for which purpose a meeting was called for last Wednesday afternoon at the Royal Hotel, Princes-street, Edinburgh. Classical music has now become so much in request in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and other Scottish localities that the scheme referred to is a natural result, and one that will doubtless be realised.

ART NOTES.

The insertion of a notice of the Dudley Gallery exhibition is unavoidably deferred.

Mr. Millais, R.A., has been chosen a foreign associate of the French Academy of Arts, in the room of the late Mr. Dupré.

Yesterday week the Metropolitan Board of Works granted a request for permission to erect a statue to the memory of the late Thomas Carlyle on the Chelsea Embankment, on a site immediately opposite Cheyne-row.

A school of fine arts is about to be established at Constantinople. It is to comprise a library and a collection of casts, and its mission will be to revive industrial art and architecture in Turkey. Lectures will be given in Turkish on painting, sculpture, decorative art, engraving, and æsthetics.

Before the Prince of Waldeck and his daughter the Princess Helen left London, they sat to Mr. J. Thomson, of 78, Buckingham Palace-road, for their photographs. They were accompanied by Prince Leopold, and Mr. Thomson has produced excellent photographs of all his illustrious sitters. Prince Leopold and his affianced bride have also honoured Mr. Bassano, of Old Bond-street, with sittings.

The monument which her Majesty commissioned Mr. R. Belt to prepare for the perpetuation of the memory of the late Lord Beaconsfield has been completed and erected in Highbury church. It is placed above the seat habitually occupied by the late statesman. The whole of the architectural surroundings are in strict accord with the architecture of the church itself, and are wrought in Sicilian marble. The funds raised for the national memorial to him amount to more than £6300. The cost of the statue, with all incidental expenses, amounts to £4300. A meeting of subscribers will be called shortly after Easter to determine what shall be done with the surplus.

The art prizes to be awarded in December next by the Goldsmiths' Company are 22 in number, ranging from £10 to £70, and representing a total of £510. The two highest sums are for the best model, finished ready for casting, of a ewer and dish, the subject to be taken from Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner," and a group representing "a man coursing with two greyhounds," and the prizes will only be given to the actual executants, who must be British subjects. We learn that the company have resolved that a travelling scholarship of £100 may be awarded by the Warden under certain conditions to a student who has shown exceptional talent, to enable him to study art in the precious metals on the Continent.

In our description, last week, of the new Royal Avenue Theatre, on the Thames Embankment, near Charing-cross, the elevation was stated to be of Portland stone. The material used is the "corn-grit and bottom-bed" stone, produced by the Corslam Down Quarry, in Wiltshire, belonging to Messrs. Yockney and Co., who supplied it to the contractors, Messrs. Kirk and Randall, under the architect's specification.

With reference to our illustrations of the balloon disaster in the Channel last Saturday, we are indebted to Mr. J. R. Kirby, Rear-Commodore of the Royal Cinque Ports Yacht Club, for the sketch of the rescue of the balloon by the Calais packet Foam, as seen by him through a telescope from the Yacht Club House at Dover; and we have also to acknowledge the assistance of a sketch by Mr. E. Dale, of Harbour-street, Folkestone, giving a view of East Wear Bay and the railway between Folkestone and Dover, the place where the balloon left the shore in the attempt to cross the Channel.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Paris, Tuesday, March 7.

The news of the attempt on Queen Victoria's life was received here with indignation by all classes. At a meeting of English residents on Monday in the English church, it was unanimously resolved to send an address to Queen Victoria, expressing deep thankfulness at her escape from assassination. Before the meeting separated Mr. Yeatman, an American, requested that his fellow-countrymen in Paris might be allowed also to sign the address. The request was at once acceded to.

Paris is charming in this sunny spring weather, when the trees along the boulevards begin boldly to push out their buds, and when the whole town is perfumed with violets. Now, in the woods of Sèvres, Viroflay, Bellevue, and Meudon, there are scores of little girls who go forth at daybreak to cull from amongst the dry leaves those flowers that are the poetry and perfume of the streets of the capital: on hawkers' barrows, on modest trays in the doorways, in bunches in the bosoms of the little milliner-girls, in bouquets in the hands of the élégantes—everywhere are violets, sweet violets!

And in these days of March sunshine and coryza—that other inevitable preface of spring—what are the Parisians talking about? The women are beginning to discuss the summer fashions; they are turning up their pretty noses at the democratic balls of President Grévy, who puts on his invitation cards: "Guests who come on foot will enter by the principal gateway," &c. In the afternoon, before the drive in the Bois, it is the fashion to flirt a moment in the gallery of the Aquarellistes. Then rumour says that Bontoux is going to refloat the Union Générale, that he has already a hundred thousand new shares half paid up, or, in other words, a sum of twenty-five millions, which he proposes to devote to buying up the affairs of the old Union. But the intrepid Bontoux is going too fast; he has yet to appear before the magistrates in the Court of Correctional Police.

People talk, too, about M. Beauquier's bill for abolishing the penalty attached to the assumption of titles of nobility. Modern Paris is full of Mascarilles. Figaro advertises titles of prince and baron for fifty and thirty thousand francs. Everybody knows that the Marquis de Trois-Etoiles is a simple Durand; but his assiduity in paying a yearly visit to the Chapelle Expiatoire and listening to the mass for the repose of the souls of Louis XVI. and of his wife, Marie-Antoinette, stands him in lieu of genealogy. M. Beauquier's bill is, perhaps, superfluous.

For that matter, the bill is probably destined to be swamped: for never has Parliamentary initiative been carried to such an excess as it now is. The Chamber elected last August has already more bills in hand than it could discuss within the duration of its mandate, even if it sat every month in the year and every day in the month. This excess of bills and the multiplicity of committee business happily renders Parliament profoundly uninteresting, and the Parisians are only too happy to talk about other subjects.

The past week had been a week of blood. M. Chabrilat, the manager of the Ambigu, being on the brink of failure, attempted suicide on Thursday by shooting himself; but the wound was not fatal. Then came three crimes which have been named from the streets in which they were perpetrated—the crime of the Rue Rambuteau, of the Rue Labat, and of the Rue Mercier. The three crimes resemble each other in nature and motives, murder and robbery.

A new ballet, "Namouna," music by M. Edouard Lalo, was produced at the Opera last night. The libretto, by MM. Nuitter and Petitpa, is inferior. The music has raised quite a controversy. On the first night it was laughed at by the Bravotians, who were the majority, and applauded by the artists and raffinés, who were, as usual, the minority. The composer, M. Lalo, is, with Franck and Saint-Saëns, held by certain connoisseurs to be one of the three remarkable musicians of the day. Hitherto, however, M. Lalo has been known and esteemed as a symphonist, and "Namouna" was his debut on the stage. And M. Lalo is sixty years of age! The work is being discussed with a certain asperity in the press. The connoisseurs and the habitués of Pasedeloup's concerts are prepared to support "Namouna" as a protestation against the facile melodies of Olivier Métra.

Another lottery! On March 16 will begin the issue of tickets of the lottery of the Dramatic Artists' Mutual Aid Association. The grand prize will be 100,000*fr.* The other prizes, varying in value from 50,000*fr.* to 500*fr.*, will form a total of 400,000*fr.* The number of tickets issued will be 1,600,000, and the number of prizes 160. This abundance of lotteries is only one of the many points of resemblance between the manners of the end of the nineteenth and of the end of the eighteenth century.

Frederick Szarvady, the friend and companion of Kossuth in 1848, died in Paris last Thursday, at the age of sixty. Szarvady had lived for many years in Paris, occupying himself with journalism and political writing. He was highly esteemed, and had many friends in literary and artistic circles here. In 1855 Szarvady married the celebrated pianist Wilhelmina Clauss.

The annual horse show or Concours Hippique will take place at the Palais de l'Industrie from March 29 to April 16. The Concours Hippique has of late years become an afternoon rendezvous of elegant society, and one of the events of the Parisian year.

On Saturday last the Académie des Beaux-Arts proceeded to the election of a foreign associate in place of the sculptor Dupré, who died at Florence recently. The committee presented in order of preference; firstly, the Belgian sculptor Geefs; secondly, Mr. John Everett Millais; and, thirdly, the composer Liszt. Mr. Millais was elected by 21 votes against 13 given to M. Geefs. Mr. Millais' name is well known in France, and his painting has always been highly appreciated here. At the last exhibition Mr. Millais obtained a medal of honour and the decoration of the Legion of Honour.

The smack Nelson, of Yarmouth, arrived recently at that port with a leathern bag, which the crew had dredged up in the North Sea, and which was found to contain cheques and documents representing a value of £6000. The bag, which was identified as belonging to the steamer Annie Arbib, lost in the North Sea in November last, has been handed over to the authorities.

Mr. William Morant Baker, of Wimpole-street, a member of the Board of Examiners of the Royal College of Surgeons, and well known for his valuable contributions to surgical science, has been elected surgeon at St. Bartholomew's Hospital; and Mr. William Harrison Cripps, of Stratford-place, who obtained the Jacksonian prize of the college in 1876, has been chosen assistant-surgeon to the hospital. The election for an additional assistant-surgeon will take place on the 23rd inst.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

Her Majesty's merciful preservation from the attempt on her life at Windsor Railway Station on March 2 naturally caused all Parliamentary Parties to unite in a unanimous Address of loyal and heartfelt sympathy with the Queen. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, fresh from Windsor Castle, was on Monday afternoon happily enabled to inform Lord Granville that her Majesty had not suffered in health in the slightest degree from the shock. This welcome fact, communicated to the Upper House by the noble Earl, was received with marked satisfaction by the small gathering of Peers, who also pointed with cheers the well-rounded sentences of the Foreign Secretary, likewise the more clearly uttered speech in which the Marquis of Salisbury seconded the motion for the well-worded Address of congratulation. It was unfortunate that the miserable Bradlaugh wrangle had to be resumed the same evening in the Lower House before Mr. Gladstone and Sir Stafford Northcote could secure the opportunity to give expression to the equally loyal sentiments of the Commons on the occasion. I was glad to hear the Prime Minister, however, warm up towards the close of his unexceptional speech, and elicit general cheering by his eloquently enunciated declaration of the great price set by the House of Commons "upon the continuance of her Majesty's precious life and of her beneficent reign—a reign already prolonged beyond that of any other Queen in this country, but destined, as all of us must hope, to still count many happy years of blessing to the nation."

A Parliamentary deadlock! That is what we have come to. To paraphrase the words used in another sense by Lord Granville on Monday, it is "a pain, a sadness, and a shame, unhappily unaccompanied by circumstances of a compensating character," that Parliament has sat for close upon five weeks without a single one of the important measures promised in the Queen's Speech being even introduced. I admit there have been disturbing influences, which have necessarily retarded public business somewhat; but it will become a national scandal if the Opposition and Ministerial leaders do not very soon find a way out of the Parliamentary fog they have conjured up.

Mr. Bradlaugh, the excluded but thrice-retained member for Northampton, continues to be among these disturbing influences. Plainly elated by his victory over Mr. Corbett on the 2nd inst., Mr. Bradlaugh the following afternoon held a little levee of his Radical supporters under the Peers' Gallery in the House of Commons; but the non-arrival of the return prevented him from taking any step then to march within the bar. Baron Henry De Worms was, accordingly, enabled pretty early to bring forward his motion calling upon the Government to remonstrate with the Czar for the cruelties Jews had been subjected to in Russia—a motion which, withdrawn though it was, drew forth such sympathetic speeches from Mr. Gladstone and Sir Stafford Northcote as to render it beyond doubt that good service will have been done by the debate.

Religious tolerance, earnestly advocated on the Friday, was scarcely the prevailing spirit in the Lower House, on Monday, when the Conservatives gathered in strong numbers, animated with great enthusiasm, to do battle once more against the foe personified by Mr. Bradlaugh. There had been a special whip on each side. But it was clear from the crowded nature of the benches to the left that the lash had been responded to with greater alacrity on the Opposition side. Studiously brief and quiet in manner, nevertheless, was Sir Stafford Northcote in moving the following as a resolution consequent on the Speaker's statement that the decision of the House on Feb. 7 declaring Mr. Bradlaugh ineligible to take the oath was no longer operative:—

That this House, having ascertained that Mr. Bradlaugh has been re-elected for the borough of Northampton, does reaffirm the resolution of Feb. 7 last, and does hereby direct that Mr. Bradlaugh be not permitted to go through the form of taking the oath prescribed by the 29th Vic., chap. 19, and by the 31st and 32nd Vic., chap. 72.

There was a certain degree of propriety in the choice of Mr. Edward Marjoribanks (the mover of the Address in reply to the Queen's Speech) to provide a way out of the dilemma for the Ministry. In common with the great majority of the House, the hon. member regards Mr. Bradlaugh's conduct, both within and without the walls of Parliament, "with something very like disgust and indignation." Yet, wishful to uphold the dignity of the House and put a stop to the discreditable scenes that have taken place of late, Mr. Marjoribanks in a manner took the bull by the horns, and moved that the provisions of the 29th, 31st, and 32nd Vic. "should be so modified as to permit any elected member of this House to take the oath or to make the affirmation prescribed by those statutes, at his option." It may be that, as was objected, Mr. Labouchère's promise that Mr. Bradlaugh would await the crucial division on an Affirmation Bill before again approaching the table partook too much the nature of a bargain to be generally acceptable. Be that as it may, it was a pity the Government did not put a bolder face on the matter. Having educated himself up to the point of consenting to support Mr. Marjoribanks' amendment, Mr. Gladstone might well have gone a step further, and have anticipated him by introducing a resolution to the same effect, though more aptly worded, perhaps. Rightly or wrongly, a vast proportion of hon. members do conscientiously believe that the taking of the oath of allegiance by Mr. Bradlaugh would be an act of profanation in view of his well-advertised atheistic principles. It was for this among other reasons that a perfect tempest of cheers broke from the enthusiastic ranks of the Opposition when the handing of the paper containing the result of the division to the erect and smiling Mr. Winn as the tellers reached the table foretold that once more would Sir Stafford Northcote's motion be successful. The heartiness of the renewed volleys of cheering when the figures were announced—242 for, and 257 against the amendment, practically an Opposition majority of 15—further illustrated the intensity of the feeling roused on Monday night. Still, after the right hon. Baronet's motion had been put and carried, there sat Mr. Bradlaugh in his old seat under the Peers' gallery—an incubus from which the House is not yet relieved, although it is to be wished rather than hoped that the Affirmation Bill of which Mr. Marjoribanks has given notice may remove this almost intolerable burden.

The Earl of Redesdale, for his part, can hardly claim to have contributed to a pacific solution of this tiresome Bradlaugh problem. True, his Lordship on Tuesday secured the first reading of his bill barring atheists from entering either House. But—"What next, and next?"

Meantime, the debates on the Lords' Committee of inquiry into the Irish Land Act and on the Closure resolutions of the Ministry arrest the progress of useful legislation. Out of the former languidly prolonged discussion (of which the most noticeable features have been the trenchant opening speech of the Prime Minister himself, and the able addresses of Mr. Sexton, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, the Solicitor-General for Ireland, and Mr. Charles Russell) there arose a lively passage of arms between Mr. Gladstone and Lord C. Hamilton, the Premier having occasion to rebuke the noble Lord for inaccurately attributing to him words implying that Earl Grey was "an old woman." Characterised by his customary scrupulous fairness and courtesy was Mr. Gladstone's earnest repudiation of this ill-founded charge, and also his eloquent tribute of respect to the noble Earl in question.

Bearing in mind the importance of the legislative work which has not yet even been begun, the Country may well have been amazed at the early hour the House of Commons, not for the first time this Session, adjourned on Tuesday night: there was a count-out at twenty-five minutes past eight, during Mr. Storer's speech on his "Fair Trade" resolution. Subjects of minor importance, such as the Regent's Canal Railway Bill (referred to a Select Committee), the second reading of the Bills of Sale Amendment Act, and the Criminal Law Amendment Bill, occupied the House on Wednesday. But, having regard to the incontestable Parliamentary deadlock with regard to the principal Ministerial bills of the Session, may not the Ministry and the Opposition alike be urged to show some economy of public time?

"DRAMATIC NOTES."

The third annual publication of this attractive and useful shilling record of the Stage, issued by Mr. David Bogue, St. Martin's-place, Trafalgar-square, should now be in the hands of all those London playgoers, who would be competent to judge of the present theatrical season by comparison with that of last year. These "Notes," continued from year to year, forming a supplement to the work called "The Dramatic List," and carrying on its impartial account of the performances of living actors and actresses, seem well worthy to be preserved and bound up in a volume, which will rather gain value by time as a contemporary history of the English Drama. Every new play is fairly analysed and described, a page or more being devoted to each of the more important; and the critical remarks seem to do justice, in no unfriendly spirit, to the meritorious efforts and capabilities both of performers and dramatic authors. The past year's chronicle, divided by its months, from January to December, appears tolerably complete for the London stage, and extends also to some notable performances at the chief provincial theatres. The numerous illustrations, from clever sketches by Mr. T. Walter Wilson, are highly characteristic of their subjects, as our readers will see from those which are reprinted, by permission, on a page of this Journal. They may be kept, like the "Royal Academy Notes" of the great yearly Picture-Exhibition, to aid pleasant future reminiscences of much agreeable entertainment in the passing years of life.

MENTONE.

Her Majesty the Queen and Princess Beatrice will next week travel from Windsor to Mentone, on the Mediterranean coast, where the Queen, by the advice of her physicians, seeks a few weeks' repose and change of air. The house which is to be occupied by these Royal visitors at Mentone, and of which an illustration has appeared in our Journal, is the Chalet des Rosiers, situated amidst groves of orange and lemon trees, on the slope of the hills below the Maritime Alps that shelter the East Bay; it stands about two hundred yards from the sea beach, and one hundred feet above the sea level. It was built two years ago, as a winter residence for himself and his family, by Mr. Charles Henfrey, formerly a partner in the firm of Messrs. Brassey, and well known as the constructor of several important railway works in the North of Italy. Mr. Henfrey was also the proprietor of the delightful villa at Baveno, on the Lago Maggiore, which her Majesty did him the honour to accept for her temporary residence two years ago; and he is now so fortunate as to be enabled to offer her similar accommodation at Mentone. The house and gardens command beautiful views of the coast, eastward to Bordighera, westward in the direction of Monaco; and the railway train will deposit her Majesty at the foot of the gardens which surround the villa, without its being necessary to pass through the town. The British Medical Journal says:—"We have before us authentic details as to the sanitary state of Mentone, the result of inquiries made with reference to her Majesty's intended visit; and are pleased to be able to state that the result is most satisfactory. The season has been very genial, and exceptionally healthy, from the commencement until the present time. Not only has there been no epidemic of zymotic disease, but there has been an absence of the isolated cases of such diseases which occur in all large communities in winter, at Mentone as elsewhere. Dr. Henry Bennet, the senior of the twenty-four medical men practising at Mentone, and the president of the local medical society there, who, from his position, sees many of the more severe cases of disease that occur, writes that he had not seen this winter, either in his own practice or that of others, a single case of continued fever, of diphtheria, or of scarlatina. He considers that the health of Mentone has been and is unusually good." The villas and hotels inhabited by visitors are all on the seashore and in the east and west bays out of the town, our view of which is from a sketch by Mr. W. Simpson, our well-known Special Artist. Dr. Bennet's instructive book, "Winter and Spring on the Shores of the Mediterranean" has already been referred to for the most complete account of Mentone.

The trustees of the British Museum have presented a number of volumes to the Bethnal-green Free Library. The Rev. Septimus Hansard, M.A., Rector of Bethnal-green, has become a vice-president of the institution.

The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have awarded a conspicuous gallantry medal to W. Beavis, sick-berth attendant of H.M.S. Boadicea, for gallant and devoted conduct at Majuba Mountain.

The number of steamers arriving at Liverpool with live stock and fresh meat from the United States and Canada during the present year continues very small, and the supply brought by them shows a very marked decrease in both live stock and fresh meat, more especially in the former, in comparison with the figures for the end of last year. Last week only three steamers conveying fresh meat arrived; and, as regards live stock, there were no arrivals. The collective consignment was as follows:—2153 quarters of beef, 552 carcasses of mutton, and 104 hogs.

Sir Edward Watkin accompanied some distinguished engineers from France to the Channel Tunnel works between Folkestone and Dover yesterday week. Last Saturday the scientific Parliamentary Committee appointed to inquire into the Channel Tunnel scheme with a view to its defensibility visited Dover. They first proceeded to Biggin-street, where the terminus of the original scheme is proposed to be constructed, and thence to Fan Hole, St. Margaret's. They were accompanied by Major-General Newdigate, commanding the South-Eastern district, and Colonel Gordon, commanding Royal Engineers. The party afterwards proceeded to the South Eastern Channel Tunnel Works at Shakspeare Cliff, accompanied by Sir Edward Watkin.

THE COURT.

The momentous incident on the Queen's return to Windsor from the metropolis on the 2nd inst., when her life was in jeopardy at the hands of a would-be assassin of unsound mind, has called forth the sympathy and good feeling for her Majesty from the whole civilised world—Sovereigns and subjects in one voice expressing their congratulations on her safety. The Queen herself at the dangerous moment exhibited her accustomed self-control, and expressed at once anxiety to know if any person were injured; Princess Beatrice emulating the noble firmness of her Royal mother. The Queen immediately telegraphed the Prince of Wales of the startling occurrence. Her Majesty's safety was made known to Prince Waldeck-Pyrmont and Princess Hélène before they started on their return to the Continent, they having taken leave of the Queen on her departure from town two hours previously.

Her Majesty was out walking early as usual the next morning, and later, when driving through Windsor, she was everywhere greeted with fervent loyalty. The Earl of Clanwilliam was made a K.C.M.G., and was invested by the Queen with the insignia of the order, Prince Leopold being present. Her Majesty's dinner party included Princess Beatrice, the Duke of Connaught, Prince Leopold, the Earl of Northbrook and Lady Emma Baring, the Earl and Countess of Clanwilliam, the Hon. Mrs. Egerton, the Hon. Horatia Stopford, Viscount Torrington, and Captain Edwards.

The Judge-Advocate-General had an audience on Saturday; and Major-General Du Plat was received by the Queen on his return from attending Prince Waldeck-Pyrmont and Princess and Princess Hélène to Calais.

A special prayer and thanksgiving were offered during Divine service in the private chapel at the Castle on Sunday for her Majesty's merciful preservation; the Rev. James Hornby, D.D., Head Master of Eton College, officiating. The Queen, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold were present. The Duke of Connaught and Prince Leopold attended evening service at St. George's Chapel; the National Anthem being played at the conclusion by Sir George Elvey. The Dean of Windsor and the Hon. Mrs. Wellesley and Dr. Hornby joined the Royal family at dinner.

Not the least interesting display of the affectionate interest evinced for her Majesty's safety was the visit of the Eton Boys at the castle last Monday morning to present an address signed by 900 of them. The boys being ranged in the quadrangle, the Queen, with Princess Beatrice, the Duke of Connaught, and Prince Leopold, attended by the ladies and gentlemen in waiting, received them at the Sovereign's entrance, when Henry Babington Smith, Captain of the School, and Frederic Branton Winthrop, Captain of the Oppidans, advanced towards her Majesty, the former reading the address, to which the Queen made a touching reply. The Provost of Eton and the Head Master of the School were presented to her Majesty, as were also George Chesney Wilson and Leslie Melville Roberts, the boys who attacked Maclean at the moment he fired. The Queen shook hand with them, and then retired; the Princes shaking hands with the seniors. Subsequently the two Princes Dhuleep Singh, who were of the boys, were presented to her Majesty.

The Prince and Princess of Wales and Princess Christian lunched with the Queen on Monday; and the Empress of Austria, accompanied by the Austro-Hungarian Ambassador and Countess Karolyi, visited her Majesty. The Empress was received at the entrance of the castle with due state by the Queen, the Prince and Princess of Wales, and Princess Christian; Princess Beatrice, the Duke of Connaught, and Prince Leopold having met her Imperial Majesty at the Windsor railway station, they accompanying her back to the station, after an hour's stay, on her departure for Vienna. The Prince and Princess of Wales returned to town in the afternoon.

A deputation from the Royal borough presented a congratulatory address upon her Majesty's preservation from danger on Tuesday. The Queen, who was accompanied by Princess Beatrice and attended by the household, received the address and returned a reply. The Empress Eugénie arrived on a visit to her Majesty, being met at the station by Princess Beatrice and Prince Leopold.

The Prince of Wales held a Levée on behalf of her Majesty on Thursday at St. James's Palace. The Duke of Connaught and the Duke of Cambridge dined with the Gentlemen-at-Arms at the palace the same evening.

A Council was held by the Queen yesterday.

The christening of the infant daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Connaught will take place to-day (Saturday), in the private chapel of Windsor Castle, at one o'clock. Their Royal Highnesses will shortly go to Biarritz for the benefit of the Duchess's health.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

His Royal Highness presided at the latest meeting of the governors of Wellington College, held at Marlborough House, the Dukes of Connaught and Cambridge being present; the Prince also attended a recent meeting of the Royal Society at Burlington House, when he was admitted a Fellow. Their Royal Highnesses gave a dinner party on Saturday evening at Marlborough House, covers being laid for forty-one—the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh and the Duke of Cambridge being of the guests. The band of the Grenadier Guards, under the direction of Mr. Dan Godfrey, played during dinner, and the Royal Amateur Orchestra performed afterwards. The Prince and Princess attended Divine service on Sunday; and their daughters, with the Duke of Edinburgh's children, and Countess Gleichen and her children, were present at the children's afternoon service at Berkeley Chapel—the Rev. Teignmouth Shore making special reference to the Queen in his sermon. Their Royal Highnesses dined with Earl and Countess Stanhope on Tuesday.

The Prince, president of the City and Guilds of London Institute for the Advancement of Technical Education, will take the chair at the general meeting of the governors, to be held next Monday, at 3.30, at Mercers' Hall.

Princes Albert Victor and George of Wales, on arriving at Cairo yesterday week, proceeded to the Palace of Kas-en-Nussa, which was placed at their disposal by the Khedive. Visits were at once interchanged between their Royal Highnesses and the Khedive. An excursion was made the next day by the Princes to the Pyramids of Ghizeh and the Sphinx; and on Sunday they attended Divine service at the English church. On Monday their Royal Highnesses visited the Apis tombs and the "Mastaba" of Ti, at Sakkarah; and the Khedive gave a state dinner in their honour. On Tuesday the Princes, accompanied by Sir Edward Malet, started by the special train placed at their disposal by the Khedive for Assout, whence they will proceed by yacht to the first cataract. The excursion is expected to last twelve days.

The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh have dined with Lord and Lady Hothfield, at their residence in Chesterfield-gardens; and the Duchess, with the Duchess of Teck, was present at the marriage of Mr. Cecil Stratford Paget, only son of the late General Lord George Paget, Colonel of the 4th Lancers, and Miss Mary Erskine Wemyss, second daughter of the late Mr. James Hay Erskine Wemyss, of Wemyss Castle and Torrie, at St. Peter's Church, Cranley-gardens, South Kensington. Both Princesses signed the marriage register.

Prince Leopold has been elected an honorary member of the Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar Lodge of Freemasons at Portsmouth. His Royal Highness has ordered a new tartan to be compiled on the occasion of his approaching marriage.

The Empress of Austria at the close of her visit to Combermere Abbey gave a souvenir to Lord Combermere in the form of a gold snuff-box. The Empress left Cheshire on Monday; and after visiting the Queen en route, travelled to Dover by the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway, and crossed in the special mail-boat Maid of Kent, Captain Pittock, to Calais, en route for Vienna.

FASHIONABLE MARRIAGES.

On Tuesday afternoon at Temple House, the seat of Colonel Owen Williams, M.P., near Great Marlow, by special license, were married—Colonel Henry Wellesley, Grenadier Guards, eldest son of late Major-General Lord Charles Wellesley, and heir presumptive to the Dukedom of Wellington, and Miss Williams, youngest daughter of the late Colonel Thomas Peers Williams, of Temple House, Bucks; and at St. George's Church, Hanover-square, on Tuesday, was celebrated the marriage of Mr. Chandos Pole, Master of the Meynell Hounds, with Miss Violet Denison, daughter of Mr. and the Hon. Mrs. Beckett Denison.

The Earl of Winterton and Lady Georgiana Hamilton, daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Abercorn, are to be married on the 16th inst.; and Mr. Charles H. B. Williams, youngest brother of Sir William Williams, of Bodolwyddan, Denbighshire, and the Hon. Mabel Boscawen, daughter of Viscount Falmouth, on April 18.

The Bishop of London presided on Tuesday at a crowded meeting where resolutions were passed in favour of holding a conference of clergy and laity for London.

The first regular session of the Central Council of Diocesan Conferences began on Tuesday, Mr. Cecil Raikes, M.P., presiding; and several matters were discussed, and resolutions of some importance were agreed to.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has appointed the Rev. Randall T. Davidson, M.A., to be one of the "six preachers" of Canterbury Cathedral, in succession to the Rev. Francis J. Holland, who vacates the post on becoming a Canon.

Canon Swainson, Master of Christ's College and Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, has resigned the residentiary canonry in Chichester Cathedral which he has held since 1863; and the Bishop of Chichester has appointed the Rev. William Douglas, parish Vicar of Selmeiston, Sussex, and chancellor of the cathedral, to the stall.

The donation to the Newcastle Bishopric Fund now in course of adjustment was originally intended by the donor to be given in money, but, at the request of the promoters of the fund, it was agreed to give the amount in the shape of tithes, which it was considered would yield a larger annual amount than if the capital sum had been invested in the Funds.

A meeting of the council of the Rochester Diocesan Society was held last week at the office, 26, Great George-street—the Bishop in the chair. The meeting was attended by the Archdeacons of the diocese and a large number of clergy and laity. Grants to the amount of £620 were made to the general objects of the society.

Two unique brasses have been placed in the nave of Bristol Cathedral by the Rev. Jordan Roquette-Palmer-Palmer, M.A., Oxford: one is to the memory of his father, Mr. Arthur Palmer, the first Judge of the Bristol County Court; the other in recollection of his mother. Both brasses are exceedingly handsome, and were executed by Messrs. Singer, of Frome.

The two stained-glass windows which have been placed in the Church of the Holy Trinity, Salford, in memory of the two Humphrey Booths, who were liberal benefactors to the district in the seventeenth century, were formally unveiled on Sunday week. The Bishop of Manchester preached on the occasion. His Lordship said that the land, valued at £20 a year, left by Humphrey Booth for the benefit of the poor of Salford, now realised between £4000 and £5000 per annum.

It has been decided by the Welsh Bishops not to proceed for the present with the revision of the Welsh New Testament.

The committee appointed in May last, consisting of three representatives from each of the four Welsh dioceses, met at Shewsbury in the following month to consider the subject, and were all but unanimously in favour of the revision being proceeded with. The committee subsequently met their Lordships and reported to them their reasons for recommending the revision, which reasons have, however, failed to influence the Bishops in proceeding with the work.

In support of the fund for extending the churches in Bristol, the Bishop of the diocese presided over an influential meeting at the Merchant Venturers' Hall on Tuesday. On the motion of the Earl of Ducie, it was resolved to further the movement. The report of the commission, recommending an extension to cost £70,000, with additional clergy stipends amounting to £850, was unanimously adopted. It was announced that £18,000 had been subscribed, including £2500 from the Merchant Venturers, and that Mr. Anthony Gibbs had promised £1000 per annum for three years for the Bedminster district.

INDIA.

Major Baring on Wednesday made his financial statement in the Legislative Council. A despatch from Calcutta gives a summary of the Budget, which shows that the revenue for 1880-1 (taking ten rupees as equivalent to the pound sterling) amounted to £72,560,000, and the expenditure to £76,604,000. Although there is thus a deficit of over four millions, the result is better than was estimated. The estimate for 1881-2 gives the revenue at £70,160,000, and the expenditure at £69,305,000. The total cost of the Afghan war is now set down at £21,611,000. It is not intended to abandon the Bengal opium monopoly, from which Major Baring estimates to receive seven and a quarter millions, but that Government intends to abolish the cotton import duties, and to extend the benefits of Free Trade to India.

THE CART-HORSE SHOW AT THE AGRICULTURAL HALL.

THE CART-HORSE SHOW.

The English Cart-Horse Society was founded in 1878 to promote improvement in the breeding of the "shire-bred" or old English heavy draught horse, and to distribute sound and healthy sires throughout the country. This Society, under the patronage of the Prince of Wales, with the Hon. Edward Coke as president, and the Earl of Powis, the Earl of Ellesmere, and Earl Spencer as vice-presidents, has enrolled six hundred members, has compiled and published its third annual stud-book, and held last week at the Agricultural Hall its third annual show, for which, by special subscriptions, a prize fund of between £500 and £600 had been provided. The exhibition comprised 112 horses, 78 mares, and 15 geldings, each class represented by some animals of rare excellence. The first prize of the whole collection was fairly won by Mr. James Forshaw's Bar None, a seventeen hands bay with four white feet, from Nottinghamshire, but bred in Yorkshire, which won the first prize at Garstang last year. The second prize went to the same exhibitor's Tom of the Shires. The first prize in the second class was adjudged to Emperor II., a bay, twelve years old, belonging to Sir Richard Wallace. In the class of horses four years old, without limitation as to height, the first prize went to Mr. Walter Gilbey's magnificent horse Spark, which was the champion last year, and was also first at Derby. For three-year-olds the first prize was won by the Hon. Edward Coke's Conjuror, bred near Aylesbury. The Earl of Ellesmere was first for two-year-olds with Eclipse. The champion mare was Thursa, a noble grey, five years old, owned by Mr. Garrett Taylor, of Trowse, Norwich, but Buckinghamshire bred. There was a large gathering of company each day; and their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales and the Princesses Victoria and Maud were among the visitors. The judges were Mr. W. T. Lamb, of Grantham; Mr. W. McCulloch, of Prince's-terrace; and Mr. J. Waltham, of Wisbeach. The stewards were Mr. T. Brown, of Downham Market; Mr. W. Little, of Littleport; and Mr. J. Treadwell, of Aylesbury. At the annual meeting of the Cart-Horse Society the report was adopted, and congratulations were exchanged upon the prosperity of the association.

SANDOWN PARK RACES.

The Grand Military Steeplechases at the Sandown Park Meeting, on Friday and Saturday week, proved a great success; the Prince of Wales, who was present on both days, witnessed some capital sport. The going was excellent; and, if not very large, the fields were of sufficient strength to admit of some animated speculation, while in the intervals of racing future events were not neglected. Among the races decided on the first day the Grand Military Gold Cup was won by Lord Chancellor, six years old, ridden by his owner, Lord Manners, of the Grenadier Guards, weight 13 st. 7 lb. The second in this race was Aristocrat, belonging to Mr. Jones, of the 5th Lancers, who likewise rode, weight 11 st. 7 lb.; and he contended again on Saturday for the Light-Weight Grand Military Sweepstakes, but was beaten by the favourite, Mr. F. Waldron's Leporello, of the same age, and carrying equal weight. Our Artist's sketches rather show the company; his Royal Highness with several ladies, in the Royal box, the promenade on the lawn, the Guards' band making music, and the wholesome pleasures of al fresco luncheon, with the bawling besiegers of the betting-ring, the banjo-player, and the mixture of ungenteel with polite spectators. Soldiers of cavalry regiments were there, looking on with an air of professional criticism at the riding; some were mere boys, whose airs of knowing importance were delicious. As for the incidents of horsemanship, our readers will observe how one rider came to grief at the water-jump, and how the last in the race was splashed with mud beyond recognition. The "welter-weight," who might be up to eighteen or twenty stone, was of course not in any race, but enjoyed himself with the rest of the company at Sandown.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

After lingering in a critical condition for several weeks, the Earl of Wilton passed peacefully away on Tuesday morning, having reached the ripe age of eighty-two. His connection with the turf extended over more than half a century, and, besides being one of the best riders to hounds in his day, he was also well worthy to rank with men like Messrs. Ede, Richardson, and Arthur Coventry as an amateur horseman, both on the flat and across country. His first efforts of this nature were at Heaton Park, a small semi-private meeting which he instituted in 1827, and he rode Comforter—his tenth winner of the Granby Handicap at Croxton Park—so comparatively recently as 1861. The first horse that carried his colours with credit was Gladiator, who ran second to Bay Middleton for the Derby of 1836; and Lord Wilton was part owner of Lady Evelyn, who won the Oaks of 1849, and afterwards did good service as a brood mare. His best representative, however, was, undoubtedly, See-Saw, whose Cambridgeshire and Hunt Cup victories will always rank as very brilliant handicap performances, and most turfites will agree with us that the sturdy son of Buccancer was a far better horse than Wenlock. The latter certainly credited Lord Wilton with the St. Leger—his only victory in the classic races—but the success would never have been gained had not the way been thoroughly cleared for him. He finished fourth in the Derby, behind Cremorne, Pell Mell, and Queen's Messenger. The first and second were not engaged at Doncaster, and Lord Falmouth's horse failed to stand his final preparation for the race, so that everything was very plain sailing. Isis, Parma, Modena, Napolitain, and Footstep were all useful bearers of the popular colours, which have recently been carried successfully by Toastmaster and the evergreen old Cradle. In addition to his devotion to the kindred sports of racing and hunting, Lord Wilton was specially fond of yachting, and was for some years commodore of the Royal Yacht Squadron. We have few, indeed, of such grand old sportsmen left amongst us, and he will be sadly missed for many a long day.

Fine weather and the presence of the Prince of Wales are becoming inseparably associated with Sandown Park, so it is almost needless to say that the Grand Military Steeplechases—of which some illustrations are given in another part of the paper—were brought off last week under the most favourable surroundings. Fields were large for several of the races, and some well-known performers took part in them. There were eight runners for the Grand Military Gold Cup, which resulted in a tolerably easy victory for Lord Chancellor (13 st. 7 lb.), in spite of his welter weight. He was, however, of superior class to any of his opponents, being engaged in the Grand National. Boniface (12 st. 3 lb.) fairly ran away with a Steeplechase Plate, in which he was ridden by Lord C. Innes Ker, who recently bought him from Captain Machell. There was again a very large, and brilliant assemblage on Saturday, when Robert Emmet (13 st. 3 lb.) was greatly fancied for the Veteran Stakes; but, though he ran well under his heavy impost, he failed to gain a place to Claribel (10 st. 3 lb.), next to whom was Charlie Napier (13 st. 3 lb.).

Croydon is always a very favourite meeting with metropolitan race-goers, and the attendance on Tuesday was one of the largest ever seen at Woodside. As fields go nowadays for jumping events, eight starters must be considered a fair complement for the Grand International Hurdle-Race, which was generally considered a very open event, there being little to choose in point of favouritism between Friday (10 st.), Theophrastus (11 st. 6 lb.), and Suttler (12 st.). The first-named of these cut up thoroughly badly, and Suttler is too impetuous at present to do himself justice. Theophrastus did manage to get third, but from start to finish nothing had any real chance with Glenluce (10 st. 4 lb.), who cantered home nearly a dozen lengths in advance of Ancient Pistol (10 st. 9 lb.). The very useful Cynthia (10 st. 6 lb.) took the Stewards' Plate after a pretty finish with Ilugho (10 st.), Valahaka (11 st. 12 lb.), Burley (11 st. 8 lb.), and Quindron (11 st. 2 lb.) being amongst the beaten lot. On Wednesday, Blue Blood won the Croydon Hunters' Flat Race. He is a half-brother to Doncaster; but though he cost, if our memory serves us, 2000 guineas as a yearling, and is now six years old, he has never previously earned a winning bracket. The United Kingdom Steeplechase fell to Wild Lady (11 st. 8 lb.), who performed pretty well in the International on the previous day. Solver (10 st. 11 lb.) and Hoya (10 st. 10 lb.) were respectively second and third, and amongst the unplaced lot were Khamseen (12 st. 2 lb.) and Funny Eyes (11 st. 7 lb.), who have both been backed for the Grand National.

There have been three sculling-matches on the Thames within the last week, all of them being over the usual Putney to Mortlake course. On Saturday, H. Audsley beat H. Clasper for £50 a side; and, on Monday, G. Perkins made short work of C. Bullman for a similar stake. The meeting of John Largin, of Wandsworth, who is probably the best sculler we have at present, except Boyd, with Silvester Gookin, of Boston, U.S.A., would have excited a great deal of interest, had not the former been so ill during the last week that offers of 3 to 1 on the American met with few takers. The latter at once showed in front, but incautiously going into Largin's water before he was far enough in front to justify such a step, the latter spurted hard and managed to foul him, which at once decided the race. After this, two or three other fouls occurred, and Largin eventually came in first by a couple of lengths, and was immediately awarded the race on the first foul. Trickett is matched to scull Hanlan again for £500 a side on May 1; and as Laycock and Pearce, another noted Australian sculler, are both on their way to England, we seem likely to have another very busy aquatic season.

On Saturday last the annual Cross-country Championship was decided over the usual course, when the race resulted in exactly the same way as last year, as far as the first three were concerned, the Moseley Harriers (the holders) having no difficulty in retaining the cup, the Birchfield Harriers being second, and the South London Harriers again finishing third. There were upwards of one hundred runners, and W. George, who is so well known for his splendid performances from 1000 yards upwards, beat them all very easily.

The Roberts' Testimonial Tournament resulted in a tie between Mitchell (50 points start) and F. Bennett (150), each of whom won seven games out of nine. On playing off the tie, Mitchell won two games out of three, and thus took the very handsome cup presented by Mr. W. H. Moore. Since his victory, Mitchell has challenged Cook to play 5000 up even for £500 a side, to which the ex-champion has at present made no response.

GENERAL HOME NEWS.

Lord Derby has accepted an invitation from the Committee of the Cobden Club to preside at their next annual dinner.

The Corporation of London have decided to oppose the passing of the Parochial Charities Bill.

Dr. B. W. Richardson, F.R.S., gave the first of a series of nine lectures in connection with the Ladies' Sanitary Association last Saturday at Exeter Hall.

Mr. William Henry White, Esq., C.B., one of her Majesty's Army Purchase Commissioners to carry into effect the provisions of the Regulation of the Forces Act, has been knighted.

The engraving of the "New Aesthetic Quadrille Party," which appeared in our last week's Number, was from a photograph by Mr. J. J. E. Mayall, of New Bond-street.

On Sunday the memorial-stone of a new synagogue, in course of erection in Abbey-street, St. John's-wood, was laid by Mr. Lionel L. Cohen, Vice-President of the United Synagogue. There was a large assemblage.

A new theatre, named the Prince's, was opened at Accrington on Monday. It is centrally situated, and fitted up with all the modern stage appliances. A prologue, which contained an allusion to her Majesty's escape, was received with cheers. The company sang the National Anthem.

Subjoined, in the order of merit, is a list of the candidates for her Majesty's Indian Medical Service who were successful at the competitive examination recently held:—H. H. R. Charles, J. P. Barry, R. W. S. Lyons, W. A. Sykes, G. Duncan, A. V. Anderson, E. W. Reilly, J. Scott.

There were 2589 births and 1790 deaths registered in London last week. Allowing for increase of population, the births were 125 below, while the deaths exceeded by 3, the average numbers in the corresponding week of the last ten years.

A furious gale from the north-west raged in the north of Scotland on Monday, accompanied by heavy snow, and communication was stopped in several places. During the height of the storm a shoal of whales was driven into Weisdale Voe, where more than three hundred of them were captured. The storm continued on Tuesday.

Mr. Bradlaugh was on the 2nd inst. again returned as member of Parliament for Northampton, polling 3798 votes, while Mr. Corbett, the Conservative candidate, polled 3689. The election for Malmesbury on Tuesday resulted in the return of Colonel Miles, the Conservative candidate, by a majority of 56 over Mr. C. Luce, the Liberal. It causes, however, no change in the state of parties in the House.

Mrs. Marian Smith was presented in the Newcastle Town-hall, on the 2nd inst., with a medal and diploma of the Sovereign Order of St. John of Jerusalem, by Major-General Alexander, for her bravery in the Transvaal War when she attended to the wounded throughout the battle of Bronker's Spruit; and after being struck by a ball herself tore her dress into strips for bandages.

The Senatus of Aberdeen University conferred last Saturday the degree of LL.D. upon Alexander Cruickshank, Aberdeen; James Sandilands Grant Bey, Cairo, Egypt; Professor Hunter, London University; Professor McKendrick, of Glasgow University; and the Rev. William Robertson Smith, ex-Professor of Hebrew, Free Church College, Aberdeen.

A banquet took place at Willis's Rooms last Saturday evening, to celebrate the peaceful cession of Thessaly by arbitration of the Powers and the termination of the work of the Greek Committee in connection with the Treaty of Berlin. The Earl of Rosebery presided; and amongst the other speakers were the Earl of Shaftesbury, the Greek Chargé-d'Affaires, the Earl of Dalhousie, Mr. Arnold, M.P., and Mr. Shaw Lefevre, M.P. The Greek Minister, in replying to the toast of "The King of the Hellenes," said that both he and his people felt a deep and undying gratitude for the sincere sympathy always evinced for them by the British nation.

Jumbo has been in Chancery, and, strange to say, has been released after having been only three days in custody. The time was when even this long-lived creature, once in Chancery, would never have got out again. An application was made in Chancery, on behalf of some Fellows of the Zoological Society, to restrain the council from parting with the elephant, "Jumbo," on the ground that they had no power under their charter and by-laws to sell any animal. Mr. Justice Chitty, on Wednesday gave his decision. Having heard the case fully and thoroughly, he came to the conclusion that there was no ground for the motion, and as it would be useless to bring the matter again before him he would do what the Master of the Rolls did in similar cases, refuse the motion with costs. The elephant-house is daily crowded with visitors, and Jumbo continues to be fed with dainties by ladies and children.

BENEVOLENT OBJECTS.

It has been decided by the Brighton Town Council to buy Preston Park of Mr. Bennett-Stanford, at a cost of £50,000, for the purpose of converting it into a public recreation-ground.

Lady Harriet Bentinck, who gave £4000 sterling to buy new premises for the International Hospital at Naples, has added £500 sterling to the former sum.

A concert was given at St. James's Hall on Tuesday for the benefit of Princess Frederica's Convalescent Home. Particulars of the concert are given in our Music column.

Lady Ida Low and some members of the Kyrle Society gave a concert on Tuesday afternoon to the patients of the London Homoeopathic Hospital, in Great Ormond-street, many friends of the institution being present.

The committee of Lloyd's have bestowed the bronze medal of the society upon James Beattie, commissioned boatman, of Blatchington coastguard station, as an honorary acknowledgment of his extraordinary exertions on the occasion of the wreck of the Gannet in Scaford Bay on Feb. 14.

The managers of the Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh have received from Messrs. J. C. Brodie and Sons, W.S., Edinburgh, £13,500 for the funds of the institution, from the estate of the late Dr. Thomas Hunter, Deputy Inspector-General of Hospitals.

The Postmaster-General presided last week at the annual meeting of the Post-Office Clerks' Benevolent Fund, in the Deputation-room, at St. Martin's-le-Grand. The report showed there were 734 subscribers, and during the year four grants to deserving cases were made, amounting to £180. Mr. Fawcett expressed warm approval of the movement.

The annual general meeting of the National Hospital for Diseases of the Heart and Paralysis, Soho-square, was held on the 2nd inst. at the institution, Colonel Robertson Aikman, V.C., presiding. Captain Seymour Hill, the secretary, read the report and balance-sheet, which were adopted. During the past year 8945 out-patients had been registered.

In the presence of a large assemblage, the Duke of Westminster on Monday laid the foundation-stone of the new Queen's Schools at Chester. The site, which has been given by his Grace, abuts on the city walls, and was formerly occupied by a jail. The school-building will accommodate 200 pupils, and the cost of the building is estimated at £4510, towards which the Duke of Westminster has contributed £500.

A meeting for promoting the interests of the Royal Normal College of Music for the Blind was held on Tuesday afternoon in the Mansion House—the Lord Mayor presiding. The Duke of Connaught wrote regretting that he was unable to attend and expressing his appreciation of the institution. Mr. Fawcett also wrote approving of the admirable principles on which the college was managed. Resolutions in favour of helping the institution were passed, and several subscriptions were announced. Mr. S. Morley, M.P., announced that he would give a competitive scholarship of £60 a year for three years. It was decided to give a concert in Guildhall in aid of the funds.

A concert, under the patronage and in the presence of Princess Louise, to benefit the poor of St. Aldwin's Mission, Battersea, will be given next Tuesday evening at the Kensington Townhall. Sir Julius Benedict and Mr. G. F. Bambridge will conduct; and the artistes will be Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hope Glenn, Miss Parkyns, Herr A. Friedman, Mr. Percy Blandford, Mr. Hayes, and others. Family tickets, five for one guinea, may be obtained of the Rev. T. B. Brooks, 2, Nevil Villas, Albert-road, Battersea Park.

The annual general court of the governors of the Society of Friends of Foreigners in Distress was held on the 2nd inst. at the City Terminus Hotel—Mr. E. Pauli presiding. The report submitted stated that the ordinary income of the past year had proved insufficient to meet the heavy claims that had been made, and the directors had been obliged to obtain a loan from the bankers of £500 to provide for the past quarter's pensions. The annual subscriptions had continued much on the same scale as in the past few years; and by the last anniversary festival, which was presided over by the Duke of Cambridge, £2203 was added to the funds; while the bazaar held at the Riding-School, Knightbridge, realised £6000. The number of persons relieved last year was 3256.

At the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on Wednesday their Lordships gave judgment in an appeal, "Rhodes v. Rhodes and Others," from Wellington, New Zealand, on an important question raised under the will of the late Hon. William Barnard Rhodes, a merchant at Wellington, who died in 1878, possessed, it is understood, of between three and four millions sterling. The present contention was only as to the residue, after providing for his widow, natural daughter, and members of his family who resided in Yorkshire and other places in England; and this "residue" alone was estimated at between £300,000 and £400,000. The appellant, Miss Mary Ann Rhodes, the natural and adopted daughter, alleged that she took a present life interest in the residue; but the widow, Mrs. Sarah Rhodes, the trustee, and members of the family of the testator contended that she had only a reversionary life interest expectant on the death of the widow. The case was argued for several days before the Judicial Committee, and judgment, which was reserved, was now given. The Hon. W. Rhodes was a member of the Legislative Council of New Zealand. Lord Blackburn delivered a long printed judgment, and in the result the appeal was allowed, with costs out of the estate, their Lordships holding that the appellant was entitled to the present enjoyment of the large residuary estate.

ELEVENTH BONUS MEETING, 1882.

The Report presented at a Meeting, held on Jan. 5 last, showed that on the rigorous basis of the Institute of Actuaries' 1st Table of Mortality, with 3 per cent interest and net premiums:

The calculated Liability was	£1,570,019
To which further Reserves were added of	116,684
Making the Total Reserves	2,086,703
And the Assurance Fund being	2,433,787
The Net Surplus was	£316,694

Of this sum, £35,000 was divided—an amount larger by £45,000 than any previously distributed, and producing the highest rate of profit ever declared by the Society—viz., 8.

CASH BONUS OF 32 PER CENT

on the Premiums of the Five Years. CLAIMS PAID IMMEDIATELY ON PROOF OF DEATH AND TITLE. The next Division of Profits will be in January, 1887. New Policies effected before the end of June next will then rank for Five full Years' Bonus, and so obtain one year's additional share of Profits. The Report above mentioned, a detailed account of the proceedings of the Bonus meeting, the returns made to the Board of Trade, and every information, can be obtained at either of the Society's Offices or from any of its Agents. GEO. CUTLER, Actuary and Secretary. B. NEWBATE, Assistant Actuary.

and Perfumers.

FLORAL BELL LIQUID DENTIFRICE.
Superiority and excellence over all. Unequalled for cleansing, preserving, and beautifying the Teeth and Gums.
It removes tartar, hardens the enamel, arrests decay, and imparts to the breath, under all circumstances, a most delightful fragrance. A few drops on the brush night and morning is all sufficient. Use only Floral Bell Liquid Dentifrice. Sold by Chemists and Perfumers. Price 2s. 6d. per bottle.

LIFE, GROWTH, and BEAUTY for the HAIR. MELROSE FAVORITE HAIR RESTORER.
Supplies everything to keep and restore a beautiful head of hair.
Nature's Lovely Crown Melrose is not a dye. Use Melrose if your hair is grey or white. Use Melrose if your hair is falling out and to remove dandruff. Use Melrose to give luxuriant growth and to prevent baldness. Sold in two sizes, at 2s. 6d. and 5s. 6d., by Chemists and Perfumers.

VALUABLE DISCOVERY for the HAIR.
If your hair is turning grey, or white, or falling out, use
"The Mexican Hair Restorer," for it will positively restore in every case Grey or White Hair to its original colour, without leaving the disagreeable smell of most "Restorers." It makes the hair charmingly beautiful, as well as promoting the growth of the hair on the scalp, where the glands are not decayed. "The Mexican Hair Restorer" is sold by Chemists and Perfumers everywhere, at 3s. 6d. per bottle.

FLORILINE. For the Teeth and Breath.
Is the best Liquid Dentifrice in the world; it thoroughly cleanses partially-decayed teeth from all parasites or living
"animalcules," leaving them pearly white, imparting a delicious fragrance to the breath. The Fragrant Floriline removes instantly all odours arising from a foul stomach or tobacco smoke, being partly composed of honey, soda, and extracts of sweet herbs and plants. It is perfectly delicious to the taste, and as harmless as cherry. Sold by Chemists and Perfumers everywhere, at 2s. 6d. per bottle.

NUDA VERITAS.—GREY HAIR restored by this specific: after which it grows the natural colour, not grey. Unequalled as a dressing; it causes growth, arrests falling, and its use defies detection. The most harmless and effective restorer extant. One trial will convince it has no equal. Price 10s. 6d., of all Chemists and Hairdressers. Testimonials free.—Agents, R. HOVENDE and SONS, London.

ROBARE'S AUREOLINE, or GOLDEN HAIR WASH.—For producing the beautiful golden colour so much admired. Warranted perfectly harmless. Price 5s. 6d. and 10s. 6d., of all principal Perfumers and Chemists throughout the world.—Agents, R. HOVENDE and SONS, London.

BALLOON DISASTER IN THE CHANNEL.

An unsuccessful attempt to cross the Channel from the Kentish coast to France in a balloon was made on Saturday last. The aerial voyagers, Colonel Brine, R.E., and Mr. Joseph Simmons, a professional balloonist, came down in the sea, but were picked up by one of the Calais and Dover steam-boats. It is well there was no loss of life.

They ascended from Canterbury, at half-past eleven. After waiting four days, they had got a favourable wind from the north-west. If they had started earlier in the day, it is probable that they would have crossed the Channel safely in three hours. The passage by a balloon has been frequently made in past years. At half-past eight in the morning the process of inflating the balloon was begun; for which purpose there were pipes laid from the Wincheap gasometer to the balloon, which was placed in an adjoining meadow. The quantity of gas required was 37,000 cubic feet, and this was injected into the huge indiarubber bag in about two hours. When filled, the balloon was allowed to ascend slightly, and the aeronaut proceeded to attach the car and life-saving apparatus, a work which occupied twenty minutes. A supply of provisions was placed in the car; and a couple of boxes, containing carrier pigeons, were affixed to the cordage, it being the intention of the voyagers to set free a couple of the birds when in mid-channel, and another on nearing the French coast.

"We started," says Mr. Simmons, "under conditions so favourable that neither I nor Colonel Brine felt the least misgiving as to the result. After one of the most successful ascents I have ever made, with wind and light and everything in our favour, we got fairly away from the town at 11.30. As we passed over Lord Sondes' estate at Nackington, the aneroid gave our altitude at 118 ft., and the sun was very hot. At 11.35 we were a mile south-east of Lower Hardres Rectory. At 11.36 we had risen to an elevation of 300 ft., and were three and a half miles on our way. At 11.37 our altitude was 1600 ft. A minute later we passed over a magnificent lake. At 11.40 we were coming down again; we were over a field, and got so low that we could distinctly hear some boys sing out, 'They are coming down in our field.' I consequently discharged ballast and we shot up to 400 ft. At 11.42 we found ourselves again descending, but by throwing out more ballast we went up to the same height as before, and remained at that altitude for three minutes. We were advised before starting to keep low, and we tried the force of the different currents. At 11.50 we lowered the grappling iron, and went up to 1800 ft. Up to this moment the atmosphere was perfectly clear in all directions. At 11.59 vessels out at sea were in full view, looking like small pilot-balloons in the air, and not appearing to be on the water at all. We could also see the Goodwin Sands, which presented the appearance of soles in the water. At 12.0 o'clock we had Dover in full view, and heard the noon gun fired from the castle. At 12.1 our course was straight for Folkestone. Our altitude now was 2100 ft. Up to 12.4 I had not had occasion to touch the valve. At 12.20 we were midway between Dover and Folkestone, or on the western side of both towns."

Mr. Simmons then describes what he terms a perfect photograph of the balloon and car seen on a cloud which had surrounded them. "We could see our own reflection (continues Mr. Simmons) and every detail, even to the untying of a knot which I was engaged in doing. It was a perfect portrait. There was at this moment a lovely rainbow surrounding the car—not the balloon—about 10 ft. in diameter, and the beauty of the whole scene was strikingly grand. At 12.30 we had gained an altitude of 2400 ft. At 12.31 Colonel Brine asked, 'Are you satisfied with everything?' and I replied, 'Yes!' At 12.40 we were over Shakespeare's Cliff. We observed that the sea was very green. We passed over a large residence on the summit of the cliff, and on its flat roof were assembled a number of people, who cheered us. We were not more than 500 ft. above their heads, and we conversed with them. They promised to telegraph to the London newspaper offices the fact of our being just about to cross over to the sea. I determined at this point to get a little higher, and threw out about ten pounds of ballast. We thereupon gained an elevation of 1900 ft. The slight surf along the coast line, the green sea, and the chalk cliffs afforded us a magnificent sight. At one p.m. we noticed that someone was flushing a mirror at Dover, an operation which was repeated many times. At five minutes past one we threw out sand for the first time over the water. As it rattled down upon the surface it produced a terrific noise, and we observed that it left yellow streaks in the green sea. At 1.6 we were off the Admiralty Pier, and at 1.10 our altitude above the sea level was only 600 ft. We passed over a three-masted steamer, the crew of which raised a cheer. We were then in the right course for the French coast; but a few minutes afterwards I saw the shadow of the balloon in the sea, forming a beautifully coloured picture; this indicated to me that the wind was suddenly changing, and I at once perceived that we were going in a S.E. direction. Our altitude was now 2200 ft. I let the balloon take a turn to come down, and endeavoured to remain at about 1200 ft.—that being the elevation which Colonel Brine wished me to keep. With all our manoeuvring, however, we found that the currents were bearing from the S.W., and we were swinging round about parallel to the circular form of the coast in this part. No current could be found which would take us to the French coast, nor could we see the coast on the other side, the atmosphere being misty. Colonel Brine repeatedly expressed his opinion that we were drifting towards the North Sea; but as I did not want to give it up until a few more attempts, I made no answer. However, at last I was obliged to confess that we were not going anywhere near Calais, and that if we kept on much longer we should find ourselves making for the German Ocean. This was about 2.10, and on taking another turn downwards we sighted the Calais mail-packet. We were about mid-channel, and I could tell from the direction of the smoke from the vessel's funnels that the wind was south-west. This at once determined me to be prompt in action. I directed the Colonel, who was perfectly calm, to put on his cork jacket, which he instantly did. I first let free a couple of the pigeons—one made straight for home, the other hovered about the car. With our cork jackets on we prepared for striking the water, which we did with great force at 2.32. The mail-packet had then gone away from us some two or three miles, and there was not a minute to be lost if we were to be picked up by it. With the car in the water, and our legs completely submerged, we glided slowly on. The passengers on the steamer had apparently watched our movements, and, our difficult position being observed, the vessel immediately put about, reversed its course, and came up to us within a hundred yards. At 2.46, after considerable difficulty, owing to the flapping of the balloon against the vessel, and in keeping back the passengers so that they might avoid being suffocated by the tremendous rush of gas, which I was letting out all the time, we were rescued from our perilous situation, and having at 3.15 got the balloon on board, were brought into Dover, landing at the Admiralty Pier, where we were greeted with cheers from thousands of people."

Colonel Brine and Mr. Simmons agree in stating that at the time they dropped into the ocean they were thirteen miles off Dover, or about eight from Calais. The vessel which picked them up was the mail-steamer Foam; and Captain Jutelet, the commander, gives the following account of the rescue:—

"As we were on our voyage from Calais to Dover, and when about nine miles from that port, we saw the balloon, about eleven miles from Dover, bearing north-north-west of us. The balloon was about five hundred yards up, and we hoisted our flags to salute the aeronauts. We cheered them several times as we passed under them. Immediately after this, we saw them drop something, but I did not know what it was then. I afterwards learned that it was an anchor, and that it was a signal for us to stop. I also saw some flashing, but did not know at the time that it was intended as a signal to us. After we had passed the balloon some little distance I saw it dropping, and I then bethought myself that they wanted our assistance. I told the men to get ready with one of the life-boats, and I then altered our course and went back after the balloon, which had by this time reached the water. We were about twelve minutes before we overtook them, as the balloon was dragging the car through the water at the rate of two knots an hour. When we got alongside I called out, 'Do you want any assistance?' to which Mr. Simmons answered, 'Lower your boat and pick us up.' Mr. Simmons was very much afraid our paddle-wheel would come in contact with his car. At this time the balloon was quite upright, and had not lost a great quantity of its gas. I understood them to say they could not let the gas out, having lost the rope which had control of the valve. We lowered our boat and picked up Colonel Brine and Mr. Simmons, and fastened a hawser to the balloon, and hauled it on board at the bow of the vessel. It was five minutes past three when I reversed to go to their assistance, and it was twenty-seven minutes after that when I resumed my voyage to Dover. The flood tide was running to the eastward at the time, and was rather strong, which would help to drift the balloon from us. When we first saw the balloon, some time before three, it was going almost south; but when we passed it it had altered its course, and the wind was veering south-west, which would have carried them up into the North Sea. The men were sitting in the car up to the knees in water. If the balloon had been detached I do not think the basket would have sunk, as it had a cork buoy round it; and, at any rate, I think it would have floated for a time, provided the sea had not been very rough. The breeze certainly freshened considerably after we took them on board. Both the men had their cork jackets on. I had sixty-eight passengers on board, and there was a great deal of excitement, especially amongst the ladies."

THE SAILOR PRINCES IN CEYLON.

Their Royal Highnesses, Prince Edward (Albert Victor) of Wales, and Prince George of Wales, midshipmen of H.M.S. Bacchante, during their recent stay in the island of Ceylon, visited Kandy, the ancient native capital, and were entertained with the curious spectacles, which are shown in several of our Illustrations. These are from Sketches by Mr. H. N. B. Good, who writes the following descriptive account:—

A customary annual event at Kandy is the grand procession of the "Perahara," which usually takes place at full moon in August of every year, except on some extraordinary occasion. In anticipation of the present visit of the English Princes its time was fixed to suit their Royal Highnesses, and extra preparations were made in order that it should be carried out on a still more imposing scale, fifty elephants having been brought in from the temples in the surrounding country to take part in the procession. The chiefs and headmen, about forty in number, were dressed in gorgeous-coloured garments, of all hues, red, yellow, blue, white, and of satin brocaded with gold. Their caps were very large structures, of the same materials; and some wore a quantity of jewellery. One old chief wore a ring, the top of which shaded his whole head, like a small parasol. The devil-dancers, a troupe of whom danced grotesquely, but gracefully, in front of each party of headmen, as the procession moved on, wore a small frilled petticoat, in addition to the usual native cloth, which takes the place of trousers; they had strings of shell beads across their shoulders and backs, like braces, holding on brass caps, fitted upon their shoulders like epaulettes. Under the left arm each man held a small tom-tom drum, which he beat with his fingers to the time of the dance, performed by them all together. The centre elephant of the three in the sketch carries a small silver temple and shrine on his back. He is the largest and best tusker; over his head and down his trunk he wears a scarlet head-piece and pendant; the openings for the eyes have gold edges; on his forehead he has gold knobs and plates with devices; over his tusks he wears gold sheaths, to give the appearance of golden tusks; and from his sides hang large bells, which clang as he moves along, in his slow, dignified way. The other elephants are more or less decorated in the same style. Two huge figures, representing a native man and woman, were also carried in the procession, together with some colossal figures of birds, whose necks and beaks were worked by the men inside, after the fashion of pantomime properties in England. Here and there was a man on very high stilts. The whole was lit by torches of different kinds. The procession started from their head-quarters near the Temple of the Tooth, about nine p.m., and paraded slowly through the town, to the gardens of Government House, where they passed before the Princes, returning by another route to the Temple, about eleven o'clock. The town was decorated and illuminated, in simple native style, with posts and rails of areca-nut and bamboo, covered with strips of cocoanut-leaves, looped and festooned into different shapes and devices. On the top of each post was placed an empty cocoanut, which at night was filled with raw cotton and cocoanut oil, and a wick lighted. The curious walls of the Temple and sacred grounds were illuminated in the same way, with bits of cocoanut shell, containing oil and wick. Small lamps were also hung about the Temple walls.

After the procession, the temple was entered; and the supposed tooth of Buddha was shown to the young Princes. This is only shown once a year, on the occasion of the Perahara. It is about two inches long, and was probably made of the tip of an elk's horn. It is kept in a golden bell-shaped shrine, surrounded by a cage made of stout iron bars, the door of which is fastened by a huge padlock, which one head priest alone is allowed to unlock. Before it is a silver table, on which sweet-smelling flowers (the only description of offering ever made to Buddha) are placed. Tom-toms and an instrument which in shape and sound resembles the trumpet-part of a bagpipe, make a deafening noise at the time. The Bo-tree is sacred to Buddha. These trees are objects of worship; they are never trimmed or pruned, so they are often partly dead, it being against religion to use a knife on them; and if a bough leans, or appears to be breaking, it is propped up by stones or sticks. The elephants were mustered in the inclosure round this tree on their arrival from the country to take part in the procession of the Perahara.

What is called a kraal, or corral, of elephants was also got up for the entertainment of the young Princes. On Monday, Jan. 30, they drove from Colombo to the nearest point, on a practicable road to the neighbourhood of Labugama, about twenty-eight miles distant from Colombo; they walked and rode the remaining two miles to their quarters, a comfortable bungalow about a quarter of a mile from the stockade. The kraal was not a success, after waiting from Monday until Wednesday afternoon. A successful kraal depends on the neighbourhood of the stockade inclosure, which is composed of huge posts and rails tied together for the reception of the elephants. It is kept quite quiet, so that there may be nothing to make them suspicious or scare them away. On this occasion, unfortunately, sufficient precautions were not taken to keep the natives back; and they approached the stockade from all points through the jungle, and even overran the surrounding country, making the elephants wild and suspicious. The elephant-beaters are divided into two parties, called the drivers and the back-watch, who arrange the locality and direction for a drive for weeks before. They carefully surround every herd of elephants they find. At first the drivers advance skirmisher fashion for a short distance; the back-watch then come up, and light fires along the line. The drivers again advance; and so, by dint of shouting, beating, and smoke, the elephants are slowly pushed up and at last into the stockade. My sketch was taken near the entrance to the stockade, on Wednesday morning, when we were allowed to go up to see the drive, the elephants being reported quite close. The young Princes are shown up in the crow's-nest, which was erected in the tree. But the jungle was so thick that the elephants were hardly seen, either entering or outside the kraal. Five tame elephants were taken into the stockade, and were made to tread down the thick jungle; and afterwards an attempt was made to noose the wild elephants by the help of the tame ones; but none were caught. In the evening all the five elephants escaped without any satisfactory explanation of their disappearance."

ART IN THE CITY.

At the Mansion House, one evening last week, the Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress gave a conversazione, in connection with the City of London Society of Artists and the Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts, of which institutions the Lord Mayor is the president and vice-president respectively. The City of London Society has for its objects the establishment of periodical exhibitions of works of art, and the formation of an academy for giving instruction in art within the City. The first branch of the scheme has been successfully accomplished, but the latter has yet to be attained. Although the City possesses over seventy guilds, which were established to foster and advance the interests of the various crafts, no gallery for the exhibition of works of art exists within its walls; and no society with that object was founded until the institution of the City of London Society of Artists, three or four years ago. To remedy this state of things the Society is now about to appeal to the Corporation and the City companies for aid in the work, and the conversazione of last week was a step towards this end. The Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts was founded in December, 1858, and through its agency a point of agreeable reunion between the artist and the amateur has been established. The scheme of the Society includes exhibitions of works of art, lectures on all branches of the fine arts, and conversazioni. The Mansion House was beautifully decorated, and the electric light (that of Mr. Crompton) exhibited the pictures and statuary to the best advantage. The Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress received their guests, nearly 2000 in number, in the saloon on their arrival. In the drawing-room some original sketches from Punch by Mr. Du Maurier, and the original drawings for "Evangeline" by Mr. F. Dicksee, A.R.A., were, among other things, shown. In the Long Parlour there were water-colours and sculpture, with folios of sketches. The Egyptian Hall, which had been transformed into an art gallery for the evening, was naturally the centre of attraction. Among the artists who sent works were Sir Frederick Leighton, P.R.A., Mr. Millais, R.A., Mr. Goodall, R.A., Mr. Gow, A.R.A., Mr. Houston, A.R.A., Mr. Prinsep, A.R.A., Mr. Oakes, A.R.A., Mr. Sant, R.A., Mr. Storey, A.R.A., Mr. Davis, R.A., Mr. Calderon, R.A., Mr. Marks, R.A., Mr. Herkomer, A.R.A., Mr. Birch, A.R.A., Mr. Thornycroft, A.R.A., Mr. Chevalier, and Lord Ronald Gower. During the evening some vocal and instrumental music was given by Madame Zimeri, Mrs. Mudie Bolingbroke, Mrs. Pearson, Mr. A. Matthison, Mr. H. W. Pyatt, Mr. J. H. Pearson, Mr. J. Radcliff, Mr. Barrington Foote, Mr. Hamilton Clarke, Mr. Odell, Mr. Proctor, and others. Mr. Theodore Drew being the conductor and accompanist. All the artistes gave their services gratuitously. Refreshment was served in the old ball-room on the first floor. The arrangements were made by Mr. Deputy Edmeston, Mr. E. W. Parkes, and Mr. J. E. Dicksee, the curator of the works of art belonging to the Corporation.

ROYAL NATIONAL LIFE-BOAT INSTITUTION.

At a meeting of this institution, held on the 2nd inst., at its house, John-street, Adelphi, rewards amounting to £130 were granted to the crews of life-boats of the institution for services rendered during the past month. The committee approved of the report of Captain Laprimandaye, R.N., district inspector of life-boats to the institution, on the conduct of the Llanddulas life-boatmen—who had been severely censured by the Coroner for Denbighshire for not having rescued the crew of the smack Hecla, which was wrecked off Llanddulas on Jan. 27. It appeared that the wreck took place on a Sunday, when the life-boat's crew were scattered abroad, and could not be assembled in time to save the vessel's crew, two of whom unfortunately perished. A reward of £10 was granted to five men named O'Donnel, belonging to Innisfree Island, county Donegal, for their persevering services in their small boat in saving, during a gale of wind and a heavy sea, eight persons who, while gathering seaweed on an uninhabited island, had lost their boat, and were in great danger of perishing from cold, hunger, and exposure. Payments amounting to £1100 were made on some of the 270 life-boat establishments of the institution. The receipts of various contributions and legacies was announced.

The Lord Mayor of London has consented to preside over the forthcoming annual meeting of the institution, which will be held at the Mansion House on Thursday, the 23rd inst.

Two firms of law stationers having been severally fined £50 for certain steps taken by them in connection with the probate of wills, they appealed to the Lords Justices, who decided that the engrossing of a will and the taking of the will and its engrossment to Somerset House did not constitute such an evasion of the prerogatives of proctors as is prohibited by statute. The Judges were unanimously of opinion that the appellants merely acted as agents of solicitors. The judgment of the Court below was, therefore, reversed.

ROYAL INSTITUTION LECTURES.

MECHANISM OF THE EYE.

Professor McKendrick began his seventh lecture on Tuesday, the 28th ult., with experiments illustrating the electrical currents of muscles and nerves, after which, by means of the eye of a frog, he demonstrated the production of electric variations by the action of light upon the retina. He next explained and exhibited the ingenious apparatus invented to determine the refractive powers of the media in the eye, through which the light passes, and the curvatures of the refractive surfaces—both important points. It was shown how the former object is attained by the refractometer of Abbe, and the latter, by the ophthalmoscope of Helmholtz; the cornea being selected as a subject for investigation. It was also explained how what is termed the "visual angle" is ascertained, by the determination of the size of the image of an object on the retina, and also of the size of the object and its distance from the eye. This was illustrated by reference to examples; and the means by which we are enabled to see both very minute and very distant objects was explained. It was also demonstrated that acuteness of vision varies in the inverse ratio to the size of the visual angle, and that it diminishes as the angle increases. The phenomenon termed "images of diffusion" was said to be due to the rays not coming to an accurate focus on the retina, and thus causing indistinct vision. Astigmatism, and some other forms of defective sight, were described; and an account was given of the remedial optical apparatus invented by Dr. Thomas Young, Sir G. B. Airy, and other philosophers.

GEOGRAPHICAL DISTRIBUTION OF ANIMALS.

Mr. P. L. Solater, Ph.D., F.R.S., in his third lecture, on the 2nd instant, began with an account of the fauna of the Neotropical region (Southern and Central America and the West Indies), which is strikingly different to that of the Australian region. Among the characteristic types are peculiar monkeys, differing from those of the old world, in living solely in forests; the puma, and jaguar. The elephant is represented by the extinct gigantic fossil mastodon; and the ungulates by the tapir, peccary, and useful llama. The edentates, the armadillo, sloth, and ante-eater, specially appertain to this region. The opossum alone represents the marsupials. The characteristic birds are very numerous. Eminent among these are the humming-birds, of which alone four hundred species are known. These form the subject of one of Mr. John Gould's magnificent works. The bird fauna of the West Indies is much increased by winter visitors. The Ethiopian region was next considered, and described as consisting of Africa, south of the Atlas, Arabia, Madagascar, and part of India. Its fauna includes all the larger animals—the elephant, rhinoceros, hippopotamus, and giraffe; and it is now almost the only home of the lion. Its antelopes are highly valuable and characteristic. There is a large variety of birds, eminent among which is the ostrich, whose structure in some respects resembles that of mammals. The huge gorilla well represents the apes in this region. The lecture was fully illustrated by a series of large drawings of the animals commented on, the various species being enumerated in tables; and special notice was taken of the adaptability of the structure of the animals to their respective modes of life and climate.

ROMAN LONDON.

Mr. Alfred Tylor, F.G.S., M.R.I., at the evening meeting on Friday, the 3rd inst., gave a discourse relating to some Roman remains discovered near Warwick-square, London, last year, about nineteen feet below the present surface. He began with remarks on a series of diagrams illustrating the history of Roman London, and its site, boundaries, walls, and streets, and the principal roads issuing from it to other parts of the island. Many specimens of the relics discovered and large drawings of others were exhibited. The collection includes several cinerary urns, containing the results of the cremation of human bodies. One urn, 15 in. high, was of glass. Four of the urns were inclosed in leaden ossuaries, or coffins; some of the remainder were protected by roofing tiles. On the side of one ossuary was an emblem of Mithra, the Persian sun-god, which was suggested to have been the origin of the emblem chosen by the Emperor Constantine. It differs very slightly from the early Christian labarum. In reference to the ossuaries, Mr. Tylor said that the smelting and working of lead were practised in this country in very ancient times; and that at Avignon and Lyons he saw Roman lead-work, some bearing the inscription "Kantius"—i.e., "a Kentishman." The coins found during Mr. Tylor's excavations were dated from A.D. 46 to 300. The date of the Mithraic emblem was considered to be soon after A.D. 50. Suggestive remarks were made on the probably advanced stage of civilisation in Britain at the time of the Roman invasion, indicated by the statements of contemporary historians and other sources. In conclusion, Mr. Tylor stated that very careful excavations were still going on.

AUTHORSHIP AND UNITY OF THE "ILIAD" AND "ODYSSEY." Mr. W. Watkiss Lloyd, in his third lecture, given on Saturday last, the 4th inst., gave an exposition of the relation of the two great epics to each other, and of both to an identical authorship. They mark the culmination of a vast and varied originality, and imply high qualities in the poet and his auditory. In reference to the controversy on these points, Mr. Lloyd commented on its great tenacity of life, although resting upon the narrow and illusory data of dialectical philology. The prevailing opinion of German scholars is decidedly adverse to unity, the only issue with them is, whether what they term patchwork was finally turned out by a poet, or whether it is a mere aggregate of beautiful ancient incoherent lays, with just enough irregular plot to hold them together. The ancient popular view adopted in England is utterly opposed to this, and is strongly advocated by Mr. Gladstone and the late Colonel Mure. In considering the objections to the theory of unity, Mr. Lloyd referred to the corruption of texts, and the lapses of great writers. He then pointed out in the poems the essential characteristics of artistic construction, the combined lines of incident, the development of human character, the artful distribution of the general tale of Troy, and the intentionally contrasted character of the heroes and scenes. He referred to instances of artifice in the "Iliad" more refined than in the "Odyssey." The parallel dissensions among the gods and the mortals in the "Iliad" subside in the "Odyssey." The conditions of national or domestic administration are exhibited in the "Odyssey"; in the "Iliad" the wider and more dignified international and federal relations are strikingly shown. Finally, Mr. Lloyd, after comparing Homer with Thucydides, commented on the bearing of both epics upon the social and political problems which were fully developed in later historical Greece.

Dr. Tyndall's course of three lectures on the Resemblances of Sound, Light, and Heat will begin on Thursday next, the 16th inst. Professor H. G. Seeley's course of three lectures on Volcanoes will begin on Saturday next. On Friday next Captain Abney will give a discourse on the Infra-red Rays of the Spectrum.

THE MAGAZINES FOR MARCH.

SECOND NOTICE.

If Mr. Tennyson has hitherto been distinguished by one poetical excellence more than another it has been the artistic moderation which has taught him when he has said enough. This character would be gravely compromised by the commission of any more such mistakes as "The Charge of the Heavy Brigade," published in this month's Macmillan's Magazine. It seems incredible that the author of "The Charge of the Light Brigade" should wilfully spoil his work by giving it a pendant which is neither a poem nor poetry, of which the most benevolent criticism can find nothing better to say than that it is a fair musical representation of the tramp and shock and waver of battle. Even in this point of view it is greatly inferior to the late Sydney Dobell's "Summer Evening's Dream," which is poetry as well as music. Mr. Julian Hawthorne's "Fortune's Fool" travels back from America to Europe, and, once across, relapses into the weird and melodramatic. The episode of the red-headed pedlar is wildly improbable, but possesses an extraordinary power of fascinating the attention. Professor Geikie's essay on the geological influences which have affected British history sums up the results of a new and fruitful line of investigation. Mr. Gunton's paper on Queen Elizabeth's residence at Hatfield as Princess contains some curious particulars of the Lord High Admiral Seymour's plot to marry her, and the complications which resulted. In an essay on "Russia and the Revolution," Mr. Costelloe stigmatises the Czar's Pan Slavist counsellors as a greater danger to their own country and the rest of Europe than the Nihilists—a view which the orations of General Scobeleff will do much to confirm.

Blackwood is chiefly remarkable for the conclusion of "The Fixed Period"—now acknowledged by Mr. Anthony Trollope—in the same spirit of grave humour—always verging on the burlesque but never passing the line, which has characterised it throughout. "The Newest American Railroad" contains some very graphic descriptive passages, both New Mexican and West Indian. A review of some recent novels pays a just tribute to "John Inglesant."

The solemnity of Fraser bids fair to be relieved by the author of "The Wreck of the Grosvenor," who begins a nautical story, "The Lady Maud," lively and bright in description, and promising to be full of incident. Another naval topic is well handled in Mr. Laughton's memoir of the French privateer Jean Bart, who is shown to have been neither so ferocious a fire-eater nor so coarse and rude as tradition has made him. Mr. Aylward is not to be followed implicitly, but his paper on the Basutos contributes some suggestions which may be useful towards disengaging the almost inextricable tangle of South African affairs; and Mr. Leadam puts the case for security for agricultural improvements with unanswerable force. Mr. T. Bayne certainly does not offend by too enthusiastic an appreciation of Mr. Rossetti's poetry.

The Fortnightly Review is more varied than has generally been the case of late. The most remarkable among many interesting papers is a bird's-eye view of the Fenian movement, evidently from the pen of someone at one time personally concerned in it. The writer tells us that the impulse of the conspiracy was wholly derived from wounded sentiment, and this is well to know and to remember. One would have thought, however, that if the Irish felt exasperated at the Prince Consort's observation, "that they were no more fit for liberty than the Poles," they would have adopted some other method of resenting it than that of demonstrating its entire justice. Mr. Melvin views Italian husbandry with the eye of a practical Scotch agriculturist, and finds much to censure and not a little to commend. His account of the Lombard engineers who are professionally employed in adjusting questions of compensation for improvement or deterioration, as the case may be, makes one wish that England possessed so useful a body of men. Mr. Baden Powell compares protectionist Victoria with free-trading New South Wales, with the object of establishing the superior prosperity of the latter colony. Mr. Freeman spoils what might have been a valuable review of Jewett's translation of Thucydides by extreme querulousness, being thoroughly put out of temper by what he considers the Master of Balliol's slighting notice of Arnold. Among the causes of the decay of criticism Mr. Grant Allen omits to enumerate the number of clever essayists who are always ready to write smartly about what they only half understand.

The only contribution to the Gentleman's Magazine dealing with any serious question is Mr. C. Lucy's "Bargain with the Queen," the gist of which is that, in view of the revenues enjoyed by her Majesty, the nation ought not to be asked to contribute to the support of the junior branches of the Royal Family. Mr. Lucy is as unlucky as Sir Charles Dilke in the juncture he has selected for the appearance of his disquisition. "The Lawlessness of our Forefathers," "Poets' Birds," "New Finds in Shetlandic and Welsh Folk-Lore" are all very readable papers, and Miss A. M. F. Robinson's "Tuscan Olives" expresses the regret at quitting Italy with singular depth of feeling and power of diction. Belgravia is full of agreeable light reading. The humour, verging on extravagance, of Messrs. Besant and Rice's "Impossible story," the more pathetic humour of Bret Harte's "Found at Blazing Star," the weird attraction of Mr. Nicholson's tale of animal magnetism, combine, with Dr. Andrew Wilson's science and Mrs. Macquoid's pleasant talk about the neighbourhood of Ripon, to make a particularly entertaining number. Temple Bar depends mainly upon its fiction, but has also a good critique of Jane Austen, and a pleasant "gossip about bookstalls." The present number of London Society witnesses the conclusion of Mrs. Riddell's "Senior Partner," long the principal attraction of the magazine. Mr. Hitchman's anecdotes of the aristocracy, and Mr. Barnett Smith's sketch of Talleyrand in his latter days are very entertaining. The Theatre has an interesting account of E. Christy, the original founder of the "Christy Minstrels," and a sketch of Mr. Irving, with two admirable portraits of the actor as "Digby Grant." The Antiquary and the Bibliographer are as well adapted as usual to the tastes of their especial public. The Burlington has a curious account of the clairvoyant Hansen, whose performances have lately attracted attention from scientific men in Germany.

The March number of the "Magazine of Art," published by Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin, contains, with other interesting articles, one by Mr. W. Cosmo Monkhouse, on the collection of Mr. Watts's works at the Grosvenor Gallery, illustrated with engravings from his paintings. Among the numerous periodicals issued by this firm are—The Life and Works of St. Paul, Picturesque Europe, the Family Magazine, Universal History, Gleanings from Popular Authors, Picturesque America, British Ballads, Old and New London, Old and New Edinburgh, Science for All, Familiar Wild Flowers, and Royal Shakespeare.

Other magazines and serial publications received are—giving first place to the ladies—Le Moniteur de la Mode (a new fashion journal, with which is incorporated the Milliner and Dressmaker), World of Fashion, Ladies' Gazette of Fashion, Le Follet, La Saison, Le Monde Elegant, Ladies' Treasury, Myra's Journal, Myra's Mid-Monthly, Weldon's

Ladies' Journal and Household Journal, Young Ladies' Journal (enlarged), and Dictionary of Needlework; Time, St. James's, Atlantic Monthly, Churchman, Amateur Work, Across Country, Our Little Ones, Aunt Judy's Magazine, Artists' Critical Record, Art and Letters, Portfolio, Men of Mark, Pathways of Palestine, Aunt Judy's Magazine, St. Nicholas, Irish Monthly, Universal Instructor, Month, Home, Science Gossip, Argosy, Good Words, Leisure Hour, Churchman's Shilling Magazine; and monthly parts of Chambers' Journal, All the Year Round, Household Words, Knowledge, Our Darlings, Sunday at Home, Sunday Magazine, Day of Rest, Boy's Own Paper, and Girl's Own Paper.

The Cape Quarterly Review (Juta, Heelis, and Co.) is a continuation of the much-esteemed Cape Monthly, and promises to give, like the latter, a favourable idea of the literary culture of the colony. The contributions of local interest are, of course, by far the most interesting. Among these, the most important are an account of a recent "trekking" expedition of Boers in quest of new settlements, which terminated in their taking refuge on Portuguese territory; a collection of Kaffir proverbs; and a memoir of the most conspicuous man of letters hitherto connected with the colony—Thomas Pringle.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

One of our Illustrations is that of the scene in the Banqueting Hall of St. James's Palace on Tuesday week, when the Prince of Wales presided at the meeting held for the purpose of soliciting public support for the project of founding a national institution a Royal College of Music. His Royal Highness was accompanied by the Duke of Edinburgh, the Duke of Albany, the Duke of Cambridge, and the Duke of Teck; and among the large company assembled were the Prime Minister, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Sir Stafford Northcote, M.P., the Earl of Rosebery, and the Lord Mayor of London, who had seats on the dais reserved for the Royal party; the Duke of Westminster, Cardinal Manning, the Hon. James Russell Lowell, the American Minister; Count Münster, the German Ambassador; the Austro-Hungarian Ambassador, the Turkish Ambassador, the Russian Ambassador, the Belgian, Netherlands, Swedish, and Spanish Ministers, Earl Granville, Earl Spencer, the Earl of Derby, the Marquis of Hartington, and other Cabinet Ministers; Lord Redesdale, Earl Lathom, Sir Henry Brand, M.P. (Speaker of the House of Commons), and many distinguished members of Parliament, artists, authors, clergymen, and scholars, Aldermen of the City, and Mayors of provincial towns, besides leading professors of music, composers, and makers of musical instruments. The speeches of the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Edinburgh were listened to with the greatest interest. They were followed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Rosebery, the Lord Mayor, Mr. Gladstone, and Sir Stafford Northcote. Resolutions were passed unanimously, approving of the proposal to establish a College of Music for the United Kingdom and the British Empire; and promising to use the utmost exertions to obtain the necessary funds.

On Friday, by invitation of the Lord Mayor, the Masters of the various Livery Companies of the City of London, with some members of the Corporation, met at the Mansion House to consult together in what form the objects of the meeting at St. James's Palace could be most effectually carried out. Nearly the whole of the Companies (seventy-six in number) were represented by their Masters, Wardens, and clerks. His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh was present, accompanied by Lord Charles Bruce, M.P., Mr. George Grove, and Mr. Charles Morley. The Lord Mayor said he trusted that through the efforts of the Royal House a College of Music would be started which would raise that art to a level with the great position which English literature, painting, and sculpture now held before the world. The Duke of Edinburgh, who expressed his regret that the Prince of Wales's engagements had prevented him from being present in person, said the movement was one which he himself had had at heart for a long time past. The Prince of Wales had placed himself at the head of it, and they would all agree with him that the Princes never initiated a movement which was not one that was desirable for and beneficial to the whole of the people of this kingdom—such as the various international exhibitions—and the success of those undertakings encouraged them to leave this important project in his Royal Highness's hands. He trusted that they might receive the cordial support of the City Companies, and that the Lord Mayor would be able to report to the Prince of Wales that there had been very substantial aid from those guilds. The Masters of the Mercers', Fishmongers', Broderers', Clothworkers', Merchant Taylors', Carpenters', Salters', Cutlers', and other Companies assured his Royal Highness that their guilds would give the proposal of founding a Royal College of Music most cordial support; but they must consult their courts as to the amount and extent of their contributions. The chairman of the Finance Committee of the Corporation stated that the matter had also been referred to them, and would have their best consideration.

The heavy charges made for the conveyance of live stock to and from exhibitions in various parts of the country were made the subject of a complaint yesterday week by representatives of agricultural societies who met at Euston-square the managers of the principal railways. Careful consideration of the points raised was promised.

The Education Committee of the Agricultural Society of England have reported to a meeting of the council that they do not think it would be wise for them to publish text-books on agriculture, or give their approval to existing works; but if, on inquiry, they find that the present diagrams in text-books illustrative of political economy are imperfect they may be constrained to publish a series of their own.

OBITUARY.

LORD HENRY VERE CHOLMONDELEY.

Lord Henry Vere Cholmondeley died on the 25th ult., at Brighton. He was born in 1834, the second son of the present Marquis of Cholmondeley, by Marcia Emma Georgina, his wife, daughter of the Right Hon. Charles Arbuthnot. He married, July 17, 1860, Frances Isabella, second daughter of Lieutenant-Colonel the Hon. George Augustus Spencer, and leaves several children. His Lordship resided at East Burnham Lodge, Slough, and his name appears on the roll of High Sheriffs for Bucks, 1882-3.

THE REV. T. ROMNEY ROBINSON.

The Rev. Thomas Romney Robinson, D.D., one of the most distinguished scientific scholars in Ireland, and formerly Astronomer Royal, Trinity College, Dublin, died at his residence, The Observatory, Armagh, on the 28th ult., aged eighty-nine. He married, in 1843, Lucy Jane, youngest daughter of Richard Lovell Edgeworth, of Edgeworthstown, the well-known writer on education and inventions, and half-sister of Maria Edgeworth, the celebrated authoress. Between the date of death of Dr. Romney Robinson and that of the birth of his father-in-law, Mr. Edgeworth, 138 years intervened!

We have also to record the deaths of—

The Earl of Wilton, on the 7th inst. A memoir of his Lordship will be given in our next issue.

Mr. William Handy, of Bracca Castle, county Westmeath, on the 22nd ult., at Herbert Villas, Shooter's Hill, Kent, in his seventieth year.

The Hon. Catherine Nugent, widow of Colonel Patrick John Nugent, of Portaferry, county Down, and only daughter of John, second Viscount De Vesci, on the 27th ult., in her eightieth year.

The Rev. David Williams, M.A., Canon of St. Asaph Cathedral, on the 24th inst., at The Rectory, Castle Caereinion, Montgomeryshire, aged seventy. He was formerly for twenty-seven years Rector of Nannerch, Flintshire.

The Hon. Maria Margaret Stanley, eldest daughter of the first Lord Stanley of Alderley, and granddaughter maternally of the first Earl of Sheffield, on the 26th ult., at Bures, Henley-on-Thames, aged eighty-four.

The Rev. Thomas Romney Robinson, D.D., who for many years filled the position of Astronomer Royal in Ireland, on the 28th ult., after a short illness, at his residence, the Observatory, Armagh, at the age of eighty-nine years.

Miss Ada Trevanion, daughter of Mr. Henry Trevanion (of the family of Trevanion, of Caerhays, Cornwall), by Augusta, his wife, daughter of Colonel George Leigh, and sister of the poet Lord Byron, on the 11th ult., aged fifty-two. Miss Trevanion produced in 1858 a volume of poems.

G. S. Jenks, M.D., M.R.C.P., who served as Assistant-Surgeon in the 10th Hussars in the Peninsular War, and at the battles of Toulouse and Waterloo, at Bath, in his ninety-third year. Previous to his retirement, he had a large practice in Rome, and, subsequently, for a long period in Brighton.

The Rev. John Vigden Povah, Canon of St. Paul's, in his seventy-ninth year. He graduated M.A. at Trinity College, and was appointed in 1843 Minor Canon of St. Paul's, and priest in ordinary at the Chapel Royal, St. James's. Since 1840, he was Rector of St. Anne and St. Agnes, Aldersgate, and in 1845 became Divinity Lecturer in St. Paul's.

Robert John Tilney, C.B., Lieut.-Colonel 5th Lancashire Rifle Volunteers, on the 23rd ult., at Parkside, Liverpool, in his sixty-second year. He was J.P. for Liverpool, and head of a firm of stock and share brokers there. The Companionship of the Bath was conferred on him for his services as one of the earliest advocates and promoters of the Volunteer force.

Eliza, Lady Prescott, on the 20th ult., at 17, Grafton-street, Berkeley-square. She was the youngest daughter of Mr. Henry Hilliar, and was married, in 1845, as his second wife, to Sir George William Prescott, Bart., of Theobalds, Herts, by whom (who died April 27, 1850) she was mother of the present Sir George Rendlesham Prescott, Bart.

Mr. Edward Lorraine, on the 16th ult., at The Riding, Riding Mill, Northumberland, aged seventy-eight. He was son of Sir William Lorraine, fourth Baronet, of Kirkharle, in that county, by Frances, his second wife, daughter and sole heir of Mr. Francis Campart, of Kensington, and was thus half brother to the fifth, ninth, and tenth Baronets, and uncle to the present Sir Lambton Lorraine, Bart.

Lieut.-Colonel the Hon. Daniel Greville Finch, second son of Heneage, fifth Earl of Aylesford, by Augusta Sophia, his wife, daughter of George, second Earl of Warwick, on the 22nd ult. He was born in 1827, and entered the Army in 1845. His services in the Crimea included Alma, Inkerman, and Sebastopol, for which he had a medal with three clasps, the fifth class of the Medjidie, and the Turkish medal.

The Rev. Horace Robert Pechell, M.A., Chancellor of Brecon, formerly a Fellow of All Souls', and Rector of Bix, near Henley-on-Thames, from 1822 to 1872, on the 22nd ult., at Moorlands, near Southampton, in his ninetieth year. He was third son of Mr. Augustus Pechell, of Berkhamstead, and grandson of Lieut.-Colonel Sir Paul Pechell, Bart.; was married, July 29, 1826, to Lady Caroline Kerr, daughter of the Countess of Antrim, and leaves issue.

The Rev. Arthur Childe-Freeman, on the 15th ult., at St. Leonards-on-Sea, aged sixty-one. He was youngest son of the late Mr. William Lacon Childe, of Kinlet, in the county of Salop, by Harriet, his wife, daughter of Mr. William Cludde, of Orleton. He graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1840; and was for thirty-six years Rector of Edwyn Ralph with Collington, in the county of Worcester. He married Mary Harriet, eldest daughter of Mr. John Freeman, of Gaines, Herefordshire, and leaves issue.

Mr. Thomas Godfrey Hatfield, of Thorp Arch Hall, Tadcaster, and High Common, Ripon, D.L., on the 19th ult., aged forty-five. He was son of Mr. Randall Gossip, of Thorp Arch, who assumed the surname of Hatfield in 1844, on succeeding, through his wife, Christiana, daughter of Colonel William Marshall, of Newton Kyme, to the estates of her brother, Mr. William (Marshall) Hatfield. He married, 1872, Gertrude, daughter of Mr. Charles William Minet, of Baldwyns, and leaves a daughter, Gertrude.

Colonel Charles Stephen Whitehill, at Brighton, on the 19th ult. He served with the 3rd Bombay European Regiment in the Indian Mutiny campaign, including the siege and capture of Ratghur; action of Burdoda, relief of Sangor, capture of Garrakota, forcing of the Muddenpore Pass, siege and storm of Jhansi, Battle of Betwa, the storm of Lohari; actions of Koonch, Sutra, and Galowlie; capture of Calpee, battle before and capture of Gwalior (medal, with clasp). On the amalgamation in 1861, he was appointed in command of the 109th Regiment.

The announcement in our last Number of the death of the Rev. William St. Aubyn, of St. Michael's Mount, was, we are glad to learn, incorrect. He has been seriously ill of typhoid fever, but is recovering.

HENWARD (Oxford).—We shall inquire if the loser has any objection to the game being published. Thanks.

A C A (Hungerford).—The latest collection of problems is by Mr. Collins, and it may be obtained from the publishers, Wyman and Sons, Great Queen-street.

J A M (Fakenham).—Your hand has not lost its cunning from disuse. The problem shall have due honours.

J B (Swansea).—There is no objection to solutions being sent on postal cards.

W H G (Swansea).—The theme is old, and it is much too simple in construction.

S S (Lewington).—You have omitted to note the correction which appeared in a subsequent number.

J C B (Clifton).—Mr. Blackburne has not published a collection of the games played by him at Berlin last year, nor has he announced any intention of doing so.

T G (Smethwick).—Thanks. We shall be pleased to receive any contribution of yours, so kindly send the problem.

H H (Broomoor).—We are obliged for your note. The problem shall be examined.

R L (Magdalen).—A neat little problem. If found correct, it shall soon appear.

G M M (Brussels).—The little game is very acceptable. Thanks.

SACUL, D.W., and S D G are referred to the answer to S S.

W B S (New Cross).—We shall at all times be pleased to receive reports of the proceedings of your club.

COLONY (Madrid).—We do not examine problems unless they are accompanied by the author's proposed solutions.

S B E W (Dublin).—The problem by H C W is too trivial in conception, and is, besides, incorrect. After 1. P takes P, if Black play 1. Kt to Q 4th, there is no mate on the second move. The other has some point, but is too simple.

F T (Lorca, Spain).—There is no English or French translation of the German Handbuch.

BLACK.

WHITE.
White to play, and mate in three moves.

A consultation Game, played at Cercle des Echecs de Paris, Messrs. Gossip and LOUVEY on the one side, and the Count DE TAMISIER and M. DE BEZKROVNY on the other.

(Four Knights' Game.)

WHITE (Messrs. G. and L.)	BLACK (Count de T. and M. de B.)	WHITE (Messrs. G. and L.)	BLACK (Count de T. and M. de B.)
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th	9. B P takes Kt	Kt to K 5th

3. Kt to K B 3rd	Kt to K B 3rd	11. P to K 5th
4. B to Kt 5th	B to B 4th

This should lead to an even game in our judgment, but Mr. Gossip remarks that he prefers 4. B to Kt 6th.

5. Kt takes P

Castling is generally preferred, but the game in that case proceeds much the same as in the text.

The correct move here is 9. Q to Kt 5th. The move in the text gives the White an immediate advantage.

On Saturday, the 25th ult., a match was played between the New Cross Chess Club and the Peckham Liberal Club at the house of the latter, Ryelane, Peckham. There were eight competitors a side, and thirteen games were contested in all, of which New Cross won seven and Peckham six.

A match between the Greenwich and North London clubs was played last week, in which the first-named association scored 4½ points to the adversary's 2½. It was arranged that there should be seven players a side in this encounter, but at the last moment one of the Greenwich champions was seized with illness and was unable to enter the lists. The North London players, although freely entitled to claim a game against the absentee, generously, and in the true spirit of the "gentle game," declined to do so.

The British Chess Magazine for March continues the publication of the contributions to the literary tourney, and this month we have a poem by the Rev. H. W. Hodgson in praise of chess, an old theme, perhaps, but on the whole, freshly treated by the author. An article by the Rev. Mr. Ranken on the Scotch Gambit deals particularly with the Paulsen attack (7. B to Q Kt 5th) in that popular debut, and we commend it to the attention of all students of the openings. The "Jottings" record the events of the past month in the chess world, and the games are, as usual, selected with judgment, and skilfully annotated by Messrs. Ranken, Freeborough, Long, and Wate. In the Problem world one of the items is the award of the prizes in the long-forgotten Löwenthal tourney, a competition inaugurated by the Westminster Papers some years ago. Messrs. Abbott and Duffy assign the four prizes as follows:—First Prize, "Peep Beneath;" Second Prize, "Too Many Cooks Spoil the Mate;" Third Prize, "Victoria;" Special Prize for the best three-move problem, "Peep Beneath." This award is subject to the conditions, required in the announcement of the tourney, that all the problems contributed have been submitted to public criticism. There is, we are informed, presumptive evidence that the condition has been complied with; but the judges, notwithstanding an earnest, prolonged, and expensive effort to secure "ocular proof," are obliged to confess that they have failed to do so.

We have received A Complete Guide to Chess, by Herr Meyer, and shall endeavour to find space for a notice of its contents in an early Number.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated Dec. 4, 1879), with five codicils (dated Jan. 20, Dec. 7 and 22, 1880; July 15, 1881; and Jan. 3, 1882), of Mr. John Jones, late of No. 95, Piccadilly, who died on Jan. 7 last, was proved on the 1st inst. by Oliver Richards and Charles Michell Ludlin, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £359,000. The testator bequeaths to the South Kensington Museum for the benefit of the nation, to be kept in one collection, and not distributed over various parts of the museum or lent for exhibition, all his pictures in oil or water, including miniatures, vases, ornamental china, articles of virtu manufactured in gold or silver, clocks, snuff-boxes, and caskets; all his articles in ivory, crystal, enamel, bronze, ebony, or ormolu; all his cabinets, tables, chairs, commodes, and other valuable furniture in Sevres, buhl, marqueterie, lac, ebony, ivory, and all his printed books, not otherwise disposed of. He also bequeaths £4000 to the Benevolent Institution for the Relief of Aged and Infirm Journeymen Tailors, the office of which is in Sackville-street;—£3000 each to the National Society for the Education of Children in the Principles of the Established Church; and the Representative Body of the Irish Church, St. Stephen's-green, Dublin;—£2000 each to Charing-Cross, Hospital, West Strand; St. George's Hospital, Hyde Park-corner; and the National Benevolent Institution, Southampton-street;—and £1000 each to the Westminster Hospital, Broadway; the Free Hospital, Grays-inn-road; St. Mark's Hospital, City-road; the London Orphan Asylum, Watford; the Infant Orphan Asylum, Wanstead; the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, Jermyn-street; and the Incorporated Society of the Royal Artists' Benevolent Institution; and there are very handsome legacies to his executors, servants, and others. The residue of the personalty he leaves to the National Hospital for Consumption and Diseases of the Chest, Ventnor. All his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and legacies, other than those to charitable institutions, are directed to be paid out of that part of his property which cannot by law be bequeathed for charitable purposes. The legacies are all given free of duty, except that to the South Kensington Museum.

The will (dated June 17, 1879), with three codicils (dated Sept. 27 and Dec. 7, 1880; and March 18, 1881), of the Hon. Alexander Leslie-Melville, J.P., D.L., late of Branstall Hall, Lincolnshire, who died on Nov. 19 last, was proved on the 27th ult. by Alexander Samuel Leslie-Melville and Arthur Henry Leslie-Melville, the sons, and Francis Brown Douglas, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £193,000. The testator makes special provision for each of his children, and there are specific legacies to all of them, and also to his daughters-in-law, as memorials of him; to his son Alexander Samuel he leaves the Branstall Hall estate, charged with £8000 in aid of his general estate; and to his sons, the said Alexander Samuel and Arthur Henry, his share in the goodwill of Messrs. Smith, Ellison, and Co., the Lincoln Bank. He bequeaths £100 each to the Lincoln County Hospital, the Lincoln Branch of the Bible Society, and the Lincoln Branch of the Church Missionary Society; £50 to the Lincoln Dispensary; and legacies to each of the clerks in Smith, Ellison and Co., to servants, and others. The residue of his real and personal estate he gives to his children, Alexander Samuel, Charles, Frederick, Arthur Henry, Mrs. Douglas, Mrs. Wright, Mrs. Freeman, Emily, and Louisa.

The will (dated Dec. 31, 1881) of Mr. Alexander Grant Dallas, late of No. 10, Trevor-terrace, Brompton, who died on Jan. 3 last, was proved on the 22nd ult. by Sidney Young and Henry Montagu Doughty, the executors, the personal estate amounting to more than £158,000. The testator leaves to his wife, Mrs. Jane Dallas, the use of Warren House, Uxbridge, and No. 10, Trevor-terrace, with the furniture, plate, all the other contents, horses and carriages, for life, and £2000 per annum; to his aunt, Barbara Grant, an annuity of £150; to Dr. Birch, his medical attendant, £50; to each of his executors, £500, and an annual sum until the trust is finally wound up; and the residue of his real and personal estate upon trust for all his children equally, except his daughter Mrs. Phillips, who is to receive only one half of the amount of the shares of the others.

The will (dated June 8, 1877), of Lieutenant-Colonel Charles Barnard Hague, late of the Junior United Service Club, and of No. 1, Suffolk-place, Pall-mall, who died on Dec. 26 last, has been proved by William Drake Hague and Edward Lennox Boyd, the executors, the value of the personal estate being nearly £28,000. The testator leaves pecuniary legacies, amounting together to £23,000, to various members of his family, and the residue of his property to Elizabeth Ellen Hague.

The will (dated Aug. 18, 1879), with a codicil (dated March 4, 1881), of Sir Antonio Brady, J.P., F.G.S., formerly Superintendent of the Purchase and Contract Department at the Admiralty, Somerset House, but late of No. 7, Forest-lane, Maryland Point, Stratford, Essex, who died on Dec. 4 last, was proved on the 4th ult. by Henry Brady, the brother, and the Rev. Nicholas Brady, the son, the acting executors, the personal estate amounting to over £21,000. The testator leaves to his wife, Dame Maria Brady, £100, and his residence, with the furniture and effects, for life; and a contingent annuity to his unmarried daughter. The residue of his real and personal estate is to be held upon trust for his wife for life, and then for his three children. The deceased was Judge in the Court of the Verderers for the Forest of Epping.

The will (dated Feb. 15, 1872), with a codicil (dated March 3, 1881), of General Sir Edward Harris Greathed, K.C.B., D.C.L., late of Uddens, near Wimborne, Dorset, who died on Nov. 19 last, was proved on the 3rd ult. by Lord Wolverton, Dame Charlotte Frederica Greathed, the widow, and Henry John Robert Osborn, the executors, the personal estate exceeding £15,000. The testator gives to his wife £1000 and a life interest in some other property, and the enjoyment of certain diamonds for life; and to his daughter, Helena Mary, £5000. Certain plate and diamonds are made heirlooms, to go with the settled estates. The residue of his real and personal estate he leaves upon trust for his son, Edward Wilberforce Osborn Greathed.

The will (dated Aug. 21, 1879), with a codicil (dated Dec. 16 following), of Mr. Charles Henry Turner, J.P., District Registrar of the Probate Division of the High Court of Justice at Exeter, late of High Cliff House, Dawlish, who died on Jan. 7 last, was proved on the 1st ult. by Mrs. Marian Turner, the widow, one of the executors, the personal estate amounting to nearly £14,000. The testator, among other legacies, bequeaths £50 each to the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge (Protestant Church of England), the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, the Exeter Eye Infirmary, the Exeter Blind Asylum, Dawlish Hospital, Wanford House Lunatic Asylum, Exeter Dispensary, Dawlish Dispensary, and the Widows' and Orphans' Fund of the Clergymen of the Archdeaconry of Exeter.

The Rev. George Butler, M.A., late Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford, has placed his resignation as Principal of the Liverpool College in the hands of the governors.

"Paris, Nov. 4, 1878.
I have attentively examined the beautiful pianos of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons that are exhibited at the Paris International Exhibition of 1878. I consider them to be exceptional in the ease with which gradations of sound can be produced, from the softest to the most powerful tones. These excellent pianos merit the approbation of all artists, as the tone is full as well as sustained, and the touch is of perfect evenness throughout its entire range, answering to very requirement of the pianist."

"I have pleasure in expressing my opinion that the Paris Exhibition Model Grand Pianos of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons are unsurpassed. The tone is deliciously sweet, sustained, and extraordinarily powerful; the touch responds to the faintest and to the most trying strains on it, and the workmanship is simply perfect."

"The principle of the Brinsmead firm is to give the best piano of its kind the best of materials, the best of care, the best of taste, and the best of finish, and this is why the manufacturing in Kentish Town sends down to Wignmore-street so many pianos perfect in scale, sustained in tone, elastic in touch, with equal and responsive touch, and, in fact, as near as possible to that ideal that all musicians must require. A thing of beauty that is a joy for ever."

"Daily News."
"A new Pianoforte, recently manufactured by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, claims notice, not only on account of its beauty and richness of tone, but especially for some ingenious mechanical novelties, the most important being the addition of a third pedal, by means of which the sound of any note or notes may be almost indefinitely prolonged at the will of the player. Thus bass notes may be sustained after being struck by the left hand, which may then be taken away, and, with the right hand, may execute the most brilliant passages, thus giving almost the effect of four hands. The patent 'check-repeater' action, a speciality of Messrs. Brinsmead, enables the performer to command with ease the most rapid reiteration of the same note; the facility of the key movement in general being such that glissando passages can be executed with perfect ease as to render them practicable with the lightest touch. The volume of tone is intensified by a peculiar construction of the sounding-board, another improvement being the system of bracing, by which the vibrations are increased and rendered sympathetic. The Pianoforte is capable of all degrees of delicacy and power, its massive structure rendering it less liable to the injury of the tone than usual; and the instrument is altogether calculated to extend the reputation of its makers."

GENUINE DUBLIN WHISKY.
THE MOST WHOLESOME OF ALL SPIRITS.
DUBLIN WHISKY, Distilled by Messrs. JOHN JAMESON and SON, GEORGE ROE and CO., WILLIAM JAMESON and CO., and JOHN POWER and SON, can be obtained in Wood by wholesale merchants and dealers, direct from their respective distilleries.

CHAS. CODD'S ORANGE CHAMPAGNE is made simply from oranges. It is a light and wholesome tonic, and being free from chemicals as well as spirit, it is the purest and best of the non-alcoholic drinks. Price, in London, in large champagne bottles, 7s. per dozen; in small, 4s. Bottles charged 2s., and same allowed when returned.—O. Codd and Co., 79, Copenhagen-street, London. Sold by all Grocers, Chemists, and Wine Merchants.

LEWIS'S Contains Bromine and Iodine, the vital, refreshing, and health-giving principles of sea-water, the most valuable remedy for all eruptions of the skin, pimples, blotches, &c.

IODINE Braces and invigorates enfeebled constitutions, gives a healthy glow to the skin, stimulates every organ of the human frame, and is a grand substitute for sea-bathing.

SOAP.—For Hot Climates it is invaluable, quickly curing prickly heat, and such disorders. Price 6d. and 1s., of JAMES LEWIS and SON, 12, Old Bond-street, London.

SULPHOLINE LOTION.—An external Cure for Skin Diseases. There is scarcely any eruption but will yield to SULPHOLINE and fade away in a few days. Ordinary pimples, redness, scurf, roughness, vanish as if by magic; while old skin disorders, that have plagued sufferers for years, however deeply rooted, Sulpholine will successfully attack them. It destroys the animalcules which cause these unsightly, irritable affections, and always produces a clear skin. Sulpholine Lotion is sold by Chemists. Bottles, 2s. 6d.

(KNIGHT OF THE ORDER OF LEOPOLD OF BELGIUM, KNIGHT OF THE LEGION OF HONOUR)
LIGHT-BROWN
COD-LIVER OIL.
THE PUREST. THE MOST EFFICACIOUS.
THE MOST PALATABLE. THE MOST DIGESTIBLE.
Proved by thirty years' medical experience to be THE ONLY COD-LIVER OIL which produces the full curative effects in CONSUMPTION AND DISEASES OF THE CHEST, THROAT AFFECTIONS, GENERAL DEBILITY, AND WASTING DISEASES OF CHILDREN.

SELECT MEDICAL OPINIONS.

SIR G. DUNCAN GIBB, Bart., M.D.,
Physician to the Westminster Hospital.
"The value of Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL as a therapeutic agent in a number of diseases, chiefly of an exhaustive character, has been admitted by the world of medicine; but, in addition, I have found it a remedy of great power in the treatment of many Affections of the Throat and Larynx, especially in Consumption of the latter, where it will sustain life when everything else fails."

DR. SINCLAIR COGHILL,
Physician Royal National Hospital for Consumption, Ventnor.

"I have convinced myself that in Tubercular and the various forms of Strumous Disease, Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL possesses greater therapeutic efficacy than any other Cod-Liver Oil, which I am acquainted. It was especially noted, in a large number of cases in which the patients protested they had never been able to retain or digest other Cod-Liver Oil, that Dr. DE JONGH'S OIL was not only tolerated, but taken readily, and with marked benefit."

DR. HUNTER SEMPLE,
Physician Hospital for Diseases of the Throat and Chest.

"I have long been aware of the great reputation enjoyed by the LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL introduced into medical practice by Dr. DE JONGH, and have recommended it with the utmost confidence. I have no hesitation in stating my opinion that it possesses all the qualities of a good and efficient medicine. Its taste is by no means disagreeable, and might even be called pleasant. I have found Dr. DE JONGH'S OIL very useful in cases of Chronic Cough, and especially in a large class of Disease complicated with Consumption."

JOSEPH J. POPE, Esq., M.R.C.S.,
Late Staff Surg., Army, Prof. of Hygiene, Birkbeck Institution.

"I found during my Indian experience that the worth and character of Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL remained unchanged by tropical heat or foreign climate, and it was, from its uniformity of character, particularly adapted for long-continued administration. The value of 'hydro-carbons' in all debilitated states of the system is now becoming thoroughly recognised; and it is, without doubt, from the animal oils and fats, rather than from the vegetable substitutes, that we may hope to derive the surest benefit. The Oil of Dr. DE JONGH places in everyone's reach a reliable and valuable remedy, one that cannot be too widely recognised."

DR. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL is sold ONLY in capsules (Largely, Half Pint, 2s. 6d.; Pint, 4s. 6d.; Quart, 8s.) by all respectable Chemists and Druggists throughout the World.

SPECTACLES VERSUS BLINDNESS.

One-fourth of those suffering from blindness can trace their calamity to the use of common spectacles or lenses imperfectly adapted to the sight. Mr. HENRY LAURANCE, F.R.S., Oculist, Optician, PERSONALLY adapts his improved Spectacles at his residence, 3, Endsleigh-gardens, Euston-square, daily (Saturdays excepted) from ten to four. Sir Julius Benedict writes:—"I have tried the principal opticians in London without success, but your spectacles suit me admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others, is really surprising." Dr. Bird, Chelmsford, late Surgeon-Major, W.E.M., writes:—"I could not have believed it possible that my sight could have been so much improved and relieved at my age—eighty-two. I can now read the smallest print, although suffering from cataract on the right eye." Similar testimonials from John Lowe, Esq., M.D., J.P., Lynn, Physician to H.R.H. Prince of Wales; Ven. Archdeacon Henry Clifton; Lieut.-Gen. Macmillan, Brentwood; Rev. Mother Abbess St. Mary's Abbey, Hinton; Rev. J. Hargreaves, Exbridge-rd.; and hundreds of others. THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, MARCH 18, 1882.

The Queen, travelling as the Countess of Balmoral, and accompanied by Princess Beatrice, reached Mentone on Thursday afternoon. All her subjects will devoutly hope that amid the lovely scenery of the Riviera, and in the retirement of the picturesque mansion that overlooks the blue Mediterranean, her Majesty, during the next month, may renew her health, revive her spirits, and enjoy the quiet rest that is so much needed. With prompt thoughtfulness and Christian feeling our beloved Sovereign, before leaving England, indited to her people an informal and graceful letter, which is well adapted to draw closer the ties that bind them together, because it goes home to the heart of the nation. In language as manifestly sincere as it is appropriate to the occasion, her Majesty proudly records her emotion at "the outburst of enthusiastic loyalty, affection, and devotion which the painful event of the 2nd inst. has called forth from all classes, and from all parts of her vast Empire, as well as by the universal sympathy evinced by the Sovereigns and people of other nations." To all, "from the highest to the lowest, her warmest and most heartfelt thanks" are thus spontaneously conveyed.

Words expressed with so much emphasis come home to us all. The cordiality of the relations between our constitutional Ruler and her subjects are too well understood and deep-seated to need frequent expression. But so cruel an outrage as that of a fortnight ago upon the highest lady of the land, at a period of her life when sympathy and rest have been as amply earned as they are sorely needed, could not but stir to its depths the affectionate veneration of all classes. What a noble but modest record of national obligation is revealed in her Majesty's heartfelt confession that "it has ever been her greatest object to do all she can for her subjects, and to uphold the honour and glory of her dear country, as well as to promote the prosperity and happiness of those over whom she has reigned so long; and these efforts will be continued unceasingly to the last hour of her life." How few Sovereigns that have ever lived could sincerely make such a declaration, and point to a lengthened and brilliant experience as a guarantee of the future. May the signal expression of affectionate fidelity and confidence which has lately been evoked pave the way to that perfect sympathy that will be the best shield of our exemplary Queen from all peril, and ensure for her declining years undisturbed peace and serenity!

The Parliamentary events of the week cannot be viewed with satisfaction, or without serious disquietude. They have once more demonstrated the urgent necessity of such a reform of Procedure as will rescue the House of Commons from the despotism of turbulent minorities whose foremost aim is either to bring the Legislature into contempt or to waste time. Judging from the nightly displays we are now called upon to witness, high-minded patriotism would seem to be a quality that has a diminishing influence upon public life, and the will of the nation, as expressed by an overwhelming majority, to be a force that can be openly set at defiance. The carrying of the resolution, towards the end of last week, protesting against the action of the Upper House in prematurely inquiring into the operation of the Irish Land Act, by a decisive majority against the combination of Conservatives and Land Leaguers, after a debate needlessly protracted, has done little to clear the political atmosphere, or to facilitate the dispatch of public business.

The urgent necessity of obtaining one or two votes of the Army and Navy Estimates was seized upon by the Opposition at Monday's sitting for a new development of obstructive tactics. Ministerial appeals to the forbearance of private members, and the Prime Minister's declaration that the general arrangements for conducting business were "as far as possible from being creditable," produced no effect. Liberals, Conservatives, and Land Leaguers vied with each other in airing their crotchets on the motion for going into Committee of Supply; the main though not avowed object of most of the malcontents being to force Ministers to devote next week to a discussion of the required votes instead of the Procedure Resolutions. Not until long after midnight was Mr. Childers allowed to make his statement in explanation of the Army Estimates. Then followed repeated motions for adjournment, on the plea put forward by Opposition members that public necessity for the required votes was only a pretext to enable the Prime Minister to assert his imperious will. It was only when Mr. Gladstone reluctantly explained that the expected absence of the Queen was the reason for Ministerial urgency that the Opposition desisted. Not till four on Tuesday morning was this discreditable sitting brought to a close; the Parnellites, encouraged by the example of their Conservative allies, having consumed the last hour or two in reckless obstruction.

It is, we fear, only too clear that, under present circumstances, and with only two nights a week at the disposal of the Government, there is little prospect of the first rule relative to the reform of Procedure being passed, or even adequately discussed, before the Easter Recess, early in April. Whitsuntide may arrive before the House of Commons has decided upon a definite plan for facilitating the dispatch of business. If the House of Commons made full use of the time at its disposal, there would not be so much reason to object to the delay of Government business. But while the official nights are wasted in prolonged wrangles and obstinate obstruction, private members' nights are, for the most part, absolutely lost. In as many weeks there have been four counts-out following the protracted sittings referred to; and while many exemplary members, including the Prime Minister, were cruelly detained for eleven hours at a stretch on Monday, the sitting of the following evening, sacred to private members, was brought to a premature close. Such things are a scandal to our Parliamentary system, and unless a remedy is provided, will result in a barren Session, and bring constitutional Government into contempt.

Surely the present state of things in Ireland is a call upon the patriotism of the nation to strengthen the hands of the Executive rather than an occasion to indulge in party animosity which weakens its power. Although nearly 600 suspects are under lock and key, the charges of most of the Judges in the assize courts dwell upon the spirit of lawlessness that is abroad, and the difficulty of securing convictions in the case of notorious crimes. What a revelation as to the disorganised state of the country is the fact that during last year, out of 4439 agrarian offences in the whole of Ireland, only 486 resulted in convictions. What can be done in a country where murder and outrage stalk abroad with impunity, and the people are under a system of abject terrorism that wellnigh paralyses the arm of the law? There has arisen in some quarters a feeling that if Mr. Parnell and his coadjutors were to be released, their influence would be used to repress outrages. We venture to doubt the soundness of this conclusion. It is warranted neither by experience nor analogy. The Land League is simply aiming not to redress agrarian grievances, but, with the aid and at the instigation of Irish-American Fenians, to make Ireland ungovernable and to dismember the Empire. "Five hundred arrests," says Mr. Goldwin Smith, with much point, "are bad, but civil bloodshed would have been worse. No nation openly threatened with civil war ever contented itself with a milder measure of repression. If you show weakness now, the rebel Government will be re-established, and the danger of last autumn will return. It is a question between keeping the conspirators under restraint and having to fire on the people." These are the words of an advanced Liberal, who is jealous of any interference with popular liberty. There is, we fear, equal reason for Mr. Smith's rebuke of the rancour of party feeling at a time when the Government needs the moral support of the whole nation. "If the community," he adds, "were united, or patriotism could for a moment restrain party, the peril would soon be at an end, for the insurrection has not a particle of military strength. Faction it is, and faction alone, that lends strength to rebellion."

It is gratifying at this juncture to read the fearless and timely Pastoral of Archbishop McCabe, soon to be made a Cardinal, who severely denounces the secret societies which instigate the crimes that are disgracing Ireland, and calls upon the clergy to support the cause of law and order. Atrocious as are the outrages of the last fortnight, they are, however, comparatively few in number, and limited to certain districts; and it is remarkable that trade circulars tend to confirm the somewhat hopeful anticipations recently expressed by the Chief Secretary. "Although," says one report, "there is still a good deal of lawlessness and terrorism prevailing, there is no doubt that we are once more surely, though slowly, progressing to a state of law and order." In many districts Mr. Forster says rents are being more freely paid, though the Dublin Executive "has still to carry on a desperate conflict."

It is not often that the Austrians can be credited with dashing military exploits. But the march of a column of troops upon the fortress of Draguli, which had been captured by the Dalmatian insurgents by stratagem, vies in boldness and desperation with General Skobeleff's celebrated winter advance across the Balkans. Precipices were scaled, deep snow was waded through, and ice-fields crossed by the adventurous column which, after incredible efforts and sufferings, took the mountain fastness in the rear, and obliged the insurgents to retire. In consequence of this exploit, for which Field Marshal Jovanovics has received the special thanks of the Emperor, the Crivoscie district has been completely occupied, and a great number of the insurgents have sought refuge across the Montenegrin frontier. The concentration of an overwhelming Austrian force in Herzegovina indicates the eventual and not distant suppression of the rebellion. This will be a desirable result for Russia, where General Skobeleff's rash speeches against Germany and Austria have produced a dangerous excitement, and also for Prince Bismarck, who is labouring hard to repress international animosity, and to prevent the gloomy Czar from committing himself to daring adventures.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

"Smoking Concerts" have within these latter days grown highly popular in the most aristocratic circles; and, since some English ladies (oh! what would our grandmothers have said?) have taken to what Spanish, Italian, Russian, and Turkish ladies habitually take—the smoking of cigarettes—I am anxiously waiting for Smoking Balls to come into fashion. As it is, although the audience at theatres under the jurisdiction of the Lord Chamberlain are forbidden the enjoyment of nicotine during the performance, there is a great deal too much tobacco-smoke on the modern stage. The "jeune premier" rarely fails to puff a cigarette or two in the course of each act; the profligate father of the virtuous and hard-working heroine sucks a short "cutty;" and the unscrupulous swindler lights a "regalia Londres," and watches the blue smoke curling upwards, while he revolves in his mind fresh schemes of villany. Smoking on the stage has become a nuisance, and its development should be resented by the patrons of the drama.

At the same time, it may be permissible to mention that, until Saturday last, the eleventh instant, the Distressed Compiler of this page had never been present at a professed "Smoke Dinner." There used to be banquets at which the viands "smoked on the board." They smoke there no longer. Society dines à la Russe (the whole of Russian society does not so dine); the meats are cut to pieces behind a screen; and scraps of we know not what are thrust over our shoulder by the Berlin-wool-gloved paws of we know not whom. Again, there are dinners, public and private, at which when the evening has reached a certain stage cigars and cigarettes are handed round. That was (pleasantly) the case at the festivity of Saturday last; but the fact that the guests began to smoke as soon as the "loyal and patriotic" toasts had been enthusiastically disposed of did not make the brilliant gathering that which it was—emphatically a "Smoke-Dinner."

You may be aware that there is a Smoke Abatement Committee, and that, under the auspices of that body, there was recently held a highly interesting and useful Exhibition of apparatus and appliances for the consumption of smoke, and the abrogation, if only to a partial extent, of the disgusting, depressing, health-slaughtering plague of soot which poisons the atmosphere, blackens our ceilings, spoils our pictures and prints, and covers our buildings and statues with a sable grime. To commemorate the occurrence of this exhibition, the Lord Mayor gave on the Eleventh, as aforesaid, in the Long Parlour at the Mansion House, a splendid dinner, to which between seventy and eighty gentlemen specially interested in the abatement of the smoke nuisance were present.

When I mention that Sir Frederick Leighton spoke in his most eloquent mood of the dire injury which smoke inflicts on artists and on works of art; that Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, the First Commissioner of Works, pointed out that more than two hundred years ago a pamphlet against London smoke was published by John Evelyn; that Sir William Gull denounced smoke from the medical point of view, and was ably seconded by Dr. Andrew Clark; and that the President of the Royal Society, Mr. Spottiswoode, Sir Frederick Pollock, Sir Frederick Bramwell, Mr. Ernest Hart, chairman of the Smoke Abatement Committee, and last, but not least, H.E. the American Minister, were also among the speakers, you may gather some notion of the character of the assembly. The orators were as good as the dinner.

Of course all sensible Londoners must wish good luck to Mr. Ernest Hart and the Smoke Abatement Committee; but how long, it may be asked, are we to wait until active measures are taken to combat the curse of smoke? What are the measures to be, and who is to enforce them? It is discouraging to read in Webster's "Encyclopædia of Domestic Economy," a work published so long ago as 1844, the following:—

That the smoke of furnaces for steam-engine boilers, hot-house boilers, and similar works where the fire-places are of the closest kind, can be effectually destroyed has been proved by several inventions for which patents have been taken. An Act of Parliament was passed by the Legislature some years ago to compel the proprietors of manufactories to burn their smoke; but we cannot here investigate the reason why the regulation was not complied with. The principles on which it may be done cannot be very difficult to understand when we consider that smoke is merely the unburnt fuel that has escaped, because there was not sufficient oxygen present to complete the combustion just at the part where the smoke separates; and this will be further illustrated by the action of an Argand lamp, where the smoke is completely destroyed.

I read in the same work that it had been calculated that one eighth of the coal used in fuel was consumed and lost in the smoke; and that in this manner 100,000 chaldrons of coal was annually applied in London to the blackening of our buildings and the contamination of our atmosphere. Since this statement was made, eight-and-thirty years ago, the population of London has doubled. Anthracite, the stone coal of South Wales, is also recommended as a non-smoke-producing fuel. This very same anthracite was as strongly recommended by one of the speakers at the Mansion House dinner "Eppur, non si muove." The smoke abatement movement has up to the present moment been a crawl of which the tardiest tortoise that ever crept might feel ashamed.

The quotation of "Atlas's" comment on the use in the Saturday Review of "pavid" as an English word has brought me a large batch of letters, the writers of which point out that Mr. Thackeray in his "Mrs. Perkins's Ball" speaks of a young lady trembling "like a pavid kid in the talons of an eagle" while the Milesian giant, Mulligan, united the music of the polka to the double-shuffle jig of his own green land. Another correspondent states that in the delightful Thackerayan parody of "George de Barnwell" allusion is made to "the pavid matrons." Whence Mr. Thackeray borrowed the word, or whether he coined it himself in English metal from a Latin or an Italian die, I may possibly discover hereafter. The great master of English style had no pretensions to strict philological accuracy. It is no very difficult task to pick the Thackerayan English to pieces. So might you disintegrate the tapestry woven after the Cartoons of Raffaele.

"A. H.," Birmingham, asks me a rather puzzling question. "When," he writes, "was the dropping and misplacing the letter H introduced as a feature in English fiction?" The earliest instance that "A. H." knows is the bear-leader in "She Stoops to Conquer," who says, "I always dance my bear to the genteelst of tunes;" "Water Parted," or the "Minuet in Harladne." "A. H." feels sure that there is no example of the misplacing of the H in Shakespeare, or in Fielding, or in Smollett; in the old dramatists he admits that he is not very profoundly versed. Of course the practice of clapping aspirated H's in the wrong places is a very ancient one; but the problem is to know when the incorrectly dropped H and the incorrectly added one first made their appearance, to be laughed at, in English literature.

Mem.: So sorely pressed for time, I have only been able to get once through one of the fourteen volumes of "The Dramatists of the Restoration" (W. Paterson, Edinburgh). I find in two lengthy plays, "The Old Troop" and "Sir Hercules Buffoon" plenty of slang, plenty of coarse invective and vulgar repartee, plenty of mimicry of the pronunciation of English by Frenchmen, Irishmen, and Scotchmen, but no instances of "H-abusing."

Right good service has been done to the culinary art by the verbatim reprint from a rare MS. in the Holkham Collection of "A Noble Boke off Cookry, for a Prynce's Houssolde or Enny other Estately Houssolde." This handsomely printed and most interesting book is edited by Mrs. Alexander Napier, and published by Mr. Elliot Stock, of Paternoster-row. The Editor states in her preface that the "Noble Boke off Cookry" was written four hundred years ago. It is worth while remembering that what we call "French Cookery" is an art only three centuries and a half old, and that it was introduced into France (probably from Italy) by Günther von Andernach, the German Physician of Francis I. Before the time of that festive monarch, the cooks or "queux" of France were able only to roast, boil, fry, and broil. The art of sauce-making was a wholly distinct one, practised by a corporation, called "Vinaigriers," who brought round their appetising concoctions, ready made, to private houses. "Remoulade," "Provençale," "Robert," "Farce d'oseille," are all pre-Renaissance sauces.

The "Noble Boke" teaches what may be termed "flamboyant Gothic," not Renaissance Cookery. What do you think of the annexed recipe?—

HOW TO MAKE DARYOLITES.—Tak mynced fyabe and almond mylk mad with wyne and mynced brod, sandes saffron, raisins of Corans, hony, and poudre, and mele all to gedur, so that it be thik, and put it in the coffyn and bake it in the manner of flawnes, and serve it. The "coffyn" was clearly the crust. Touching "daryolites," I note in the curious letter on the Origins of Cookery, addressed in 1814 by the famous French chef Beauvilliers to the Marquis de la Vopallière, that until the middle of the eighteenth century, there existed in Paris a fraternity of itinerant pastrycooks called "Dariolets" from the "darioles," a peculiar kind of pie or tart which they made. They used to carry about their pastry at night, dancing and singing the while; but in 1742 the "Dariolets" were suppressed as a nuisance by an Ordinance of Police. But what an enchanting study is that of the philology of cookery. The book so appreciatively edited by Mrs. Alexander Napier sent me off to Ménage's "Origines de la Langue Française;" and there I found that Dariolette was the confidant of Briseune, mother of Amadis, and wife of Peryon of Gaul. The name of the heroine of romance, adds Ménage, is a diminutive of "dariole," une espèce de gâteau, a kind of cake. Rabelais observes that the "darioles d'Amiens" are much to be preferred to the richest porphyry or the rarest marble.

Readers of the "Echoes" may remember that some two or three years ago I took the liberty of introducing them to "Muybridge," who (hitherto an unknown quantity in my mind) had introduced himself to me by courteously sending me from Pala Alto, in California, a number of very curious productions, being instantaneous photographs of the various attitudes of a fast trotting horse in motion. One could scarcely help being struck, and admiringly struck; first by the ingenuity of the idea itself; next by the phenomenal celerity of the operation (the photographing of each attitude occupying, so I heard, only the five thousandth part of a second); and, finally, by the unutterably hideous aspect of the attitudes assumed by the animal in the various stages of trotting. These attitudes, however, the operator asserts to be the true and natural ones; while, on the other hand, he as stoutly asserts that the accepted, conventional, traditional, and artistic rendering of the movements of the horse are, and have been (with a few Greek exceptions), altogether false and unnatural, these forty centuries since. So I spake Muybridge fair in this page, and exhorted him to persevere in his experiments.

He has so persevered, and has largely developed them. On Monday last in the theatre at the Royal Institution a select and representative audience assembled to witness a series of most interesting demonstrations of animal locomotion, given by Mr. Muybridge, who has only very recently arrived in England. The Prince and Princess of Wales, Princesses Victoria, Louise, and Maud, and the Duke of Edinburgh honoured the occasion by their presence; likewise did I note among the brilliant company Earl Stanhope, Sir Frederick Leighton, P.R.A., Professors Huxley, Gladstone, and Tyndall; and, last not least, Alfred Tennyson, Poet Laureate. Mr. Muybridge exhibited a large number of photographs of the horse, walking, ambling, galloping, and leaping; and the postures were quite as hideous as those in the sun-pictures which had been sent me from California; but, by the aid of an astonishing apparatus, called a "Zoöpraxiscope," which the lecturer described as an improvement on the old "Zoetrope," but which may be more briefly defined as a Magic Lantern Run Mad (with method in the madness), the ugly animals suddenly became mobile and beautiful, and walked, cantered, ambled, galloped, and leaped over hurdles in the field of vision in a perfectly natural and lifelike manner. I am afraid that, had Muybridge exhibited his "Zoöpraxiscope" three hundred years ago, he would have been burnt for a wizard.

After the horses, dogs, oxen, wild bulls and deer were shown under analogous conditions of varied movement, and finally Man appeared (in instantaneous photography) on the scene, and walked, ran, leaped and turned back-somersaults to admiration. On the following Thursday Mr. Muybridge repeated his demonstrations before the members of the Royal Academy at Burlington House.

Mr. Muybridge is as modest as he is clever; and in his prefatory remarks he did not omit to do full justice to the labours in this particular field of research of Mr. J. H. Walsh ("Stonehenge"), the editor of the Field. That learned authority, in "The Horse in the Stable and the Field" (London: Routledge), pp. 131-2-3, has accurately discriminated between the received and the correct interpretation of the gallop by painters and sculptors. Says "Stonehenge": "To represent the gallop pictorially in a perfectly correct manner is almost impossible. At all events, it has never yet been accomplished: the ordinary and received interpretation being altogether erroneous. Nevertheless, if a proper interpretation is given, the eye at once rebels; and on examination of such a figure, founded on perfectly correct principles, the mind refuses to assent to the idea of great pace, which is that which is intended to be given."

The Falstaff Club flung open its portals very wide indeed on Tuesday night to some fifteen hundred guests, ladies as well as gentlemen, the former being the invités of members, under conditions of the most rigidly scrutinised vouchers. The opening entertainment was a grand Soirée Musicale in the magnificent theatre-concert hall of the club; and the performance was graciously honoured by the presence of the Duke of Edinburgh. The Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress were also among the invited guests. The entertainment was a very varied one. The programme comprised the names of Madame Rose Hersee, Miss Anna Williams, Miss José Sherrington, Miss Damian, Miss Helen d'Alton, Middle Anna Bock, Messrs. Joseph Maas, Bernard Lane, Maybrick, Barrington Foote, Herr Ondricek, and M. Libotton, all of whom kindly gave their services. This brilliantly successful concert had been organised by Mr. Wilhelm Ganz and Mr. John Radcliff, members of the Falstaff Club committee, the former gentleman conducting the vocal and the latter the orchestral departments.

Also, about eleven o'clock, did the famous elocutionist, Mr. Samuel Brandram, deliver a rhymed Address, purporting to be an invocation to the Falstaff of the past to Awake and try if he could not be a Falstaff of the present, in Covent-garden—jovial and genial as of yore; but wise as well as merry: a Falstaff leaving off sack, and living cleanly, like a gentleman. For certain private reasons I must not say anything more about this Address, save to hint that Somebody has reason to be, and ever will be, grateful to Mr. Samuel Brandram for the graceful tact and intelligence which enabled him to lick a very rough rhetorical cub into shape.

I heard that the members of the club and their guests supped very festively after the concert. Those "high jinks" I did not witness; for half an hour before midnight I went home (in the interest of the "Echoes" and the "Play-houses") to bed. When you have come to a certain time of life, one of the wisest things, I take it, that a man can do is to go home to bed. You miss the joyous company, the songs, and jests, it is true; people call you rude and unmannerly, and vow that they will never ask you again; but you have gone home to bed and saved (perhaps) just one wee drop of oil out of the rapidly-sinking store which is left to replenish (perhaps) your Lamp.

I read in the Musical Standard, in an article on the Royal College of Music scheme, the following:—

What could have induced the promoters to have selected the Earl of Rosebery to speak to the main resolution one is at a loss to conceive. He described himself as coming from a nation whose distinctive instrument is the "bagpipes," and he admitted that it was extremely difficult to speak about music. His historical sketch of the art in this country, with its faulty chronology, and sins of commission and omission, immensely amused the cognoscenti among the audience. His discovery that bluff King Hal practised day and night on the harpsichord will prove a revelation to those writing a history of the early precursors of the pianoforte class of instruments.

It is an extremely perilous thing to accuse a ripe scholar, and a curiously accurate scholar to boot, of "faulty chronology" and "sins of commission and omission," and so forth, unless one is oneself a scholar and a very diligent student of those sadly neglected things called old books. The cognoscenti who were so "immensely amused" at Lord Rosebery's remark that "bluff King Hal practised day and night on the harpsichord," had probably never heard of a certain Messer Sebastian Giustinian, sometime Ambassador from the Most Serene Republic of Venice to the Court of Henry VIII., who, treating of a May-Day festival at the Palace of Greenwich, wrote in an account of his Embassy, which has been translated by the erudite Mr. Rawdon Brown:—

"After dinner the ambassadors were taken into certain chambers, containing a number of organs and harpsichords and flutes, and other instruments. . . . Among the listeners was a Brescian, to whom the King gives three hundred ducats annually for playing the lute; and this man took up his instrument and played a few things with me. The prelates who were present told me that the King would certainly choose to hear me, as his Majesty practises on these instruments day and night, and that he will very much like my playing."

Mem: The "harpsichords" were "clavicymbals," literally key cymbals. G. A. S.

HONORARY SECRETARY OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

MR. GEORGE GROVE, D.C.L.,
DIRECTOR OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The arrangements for bringing this new institution, under the Presidency of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, into a working condition, seem likely to encounter no serious impediment. Efforts are now being made to raise the necessary funds with a view to its permanent and sufficient endowment. The National Training School of Music at Kensington will be finally closed on April 6, when the building erected by Mr. Freake, with the fixtures, instruments, and all other property of the school, are to be given to the Prince of Wales for the use of the Royal College of Music, together with any balance remaining of its funds. A portion of the amount in hand, which is estimated at about £1000, will be applied to the further private instruction of the best scholars. This was resolved on Monday, at a meeting of the committee of management, presided over by his Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh. His Royal Highness said that the school had well fulfilled its mission, and had proved the success of the principle of free education in music by having trained for the first time in this country upwards of 180 free students, educated thoroughly during the full period of five years. He observed that this school was the practical pioneer which had founded the Royal College of Music, to be developed into a really national school of music. A meeting was held on Tuesday at Bradford for the purpose of taking steps towards furthering the project of a Royal National College of Music. Two or three speakers holding high positions in the district as musicians expressed regret that further efforts had not been made to develop the resources of the Royal Academy of Music, instead of trying to supersede that institution; but ultimately a resolution was agreed to appointing a committee to obtain subscriptions towards the scheme of the Royal College of Music. A letter was read from the Lord Mayor of London announcing that the Royal Princes had promised to attend the annual gathering of Mayors at Guildhall shortly, when the scheme for the College would be further discussed, and provincial contributions would be announced.

Portraits of the Director and the Honorary Secretary of the Royal College of Music, Mr. George Grove and Mr. Charles Morley, are presented to our readers this week. Mr. Grove has long been well known to the world of literature, science, and art as a man of varied scholarly accomplishments; and not less to those who are interested in associations designed for the advancement of such objects, as an experienced and skilful conductor of their practical business. He was born in London, in 1820, and was educated as a civil engineer, in which profession he was intrusted with the erection of the first cast-iron light-houses, at Morant Point, Jamaica, and at Bermuda; and was afterwards employed, under Mr. Robert Stephenson, on the Britannia Bridge of the Holyhead and Chester Railway. In 1850, he succeeded Mr. Scott Russell as Secretary to the Society of Arts, and two years later became Secretary and Manager to the Crystal Palace Company, which post he held till 1873, and then accepted a seat on the Board of Directors. He has of late years been an active member of the house of Macmillan and Co., publishers, and for some time editor of Macmillan's Magazine. The literary researches and labours of Mr. Grove have borne fruit in numerous contributions to works of special learning, amongst which is the "Dictionary of the Bible," edited by Dr. William Smith; and he was led by this to bestow particular attention upon the geography and topography of Palestine. He was one of the chief promoters of the Palestine Exploration Fund, which has rendered such important services to Biblical scholarship. In recognition of these and cognate labours performed by Mr. Grove, the University of Durham, in 1875, conferred upon him the honorary degree of D.C.L. He has also devoted much study to the science and history of music; and his critical analysis, from week to week during the season, of the classical orchestral compositions produced by Mr. A. Manns at the Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts, were probably superior to anything of the kind in English, though only to be fully appreciated by real students. Mr. Grove has since been engaged in compiling an important serial publication, the "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," which ranges from 1450 to 1878, comprising the materials of a complete modern History of Music.

Our Portrait of Mr. George Grove is from a photograph by Adèle, of Vienna; and that of Mr. C. Morley, from one by Walter Hudson, of Hastings.

OIL ON TROUBLED WATERS.

Some remarkable experiments of throwing oil on troubled waters have been conducted at Peterhead North Harbour, by Mr. John Shields, of Perth, who has laid down an apparatus consisting of 1200 feet of piping. The shore end starts from the little fishing village of Roanhead, and is carried out to deep water 200 yards seaward of the "Bar." There are three conical valves, fixed 75 ft. apart, at the sea end of the pipe, and on the pipes being fully charged with oil, which is done by means of a force-pump fixed in a small hut on the shore, it then begins to escape from the valves, and in consequence of its specific gravity being less than water, rises rapidly to the surface. It spreads like a thin film with amazing rapidity, and with the result of laying down all broken or crested waves, so that, however wild they may be, they become mere undulations, and harmless. The result of a trial made on Wednesday, the 1st inst., when a heavy sea was running from the east, and a little to the north, was very satisfactory. At half-past nine o'clock a.m. the sea was such that no ship whatever could have made the harbour. The force-pump was then put in motion; and, after having pumped about an hour, the sea, although still running high, was perfectly harmless, and undulating from over the line of the pipes to the harbour. It is proposed by Mr. Shields still further to improve his apparatus, by closing up at least one of the valves, nearest the shore end, so as to have the oil sent more into the middle of the channel, or "fairway" to the harbour. These experiments were begun some two years ago, and have been persevered in whenever weather would permit; substituting heavy lead pipes for gutta percha, and otherwise improving the apparatus as experience showed its defects. They will be continued still further, as there is not now the slightest doubt but that the process will be successful.

Our illustrations are from sketches furnished by Mr. Shields. Major-General Hardy writes a letter to the Globe in which he says Mr. Shields' experiments at Peterhead recall to his memory an instance of shipwreck which occurred some years since on that dreaded channel-house of the Atlantic, Sable Island, where oil freely used was undoubtedly the means of saving the lives of all on board the vessel. This occurred on Sept. 20, 1846, during a terrific gale of wind, when no vessel would dare to approach the dangerous shore of Sable Island, except in extreme distress, and as a last chance, as the whole force of the Atlantic storms there rolls the billows over the low-lying banks of sand with a violence hardly to be matched elsewhere. During the storm referred to the Superintendent of the island and men with him were out watching the ocean, and were prepared, as usual, for any emergency. Mr. Joseph Darby, who then held the post under the Government of Nova Scotia, narrating this incident, states that he saw a schooner tearing her way through a sea of white water, and on board of the vessel were seen two men in the aft part of the ship, throwing apparently something, at intervals, up into the air. The schooner was the Arno, Captain Higgins, with twelve men from the Quero Bank, where they had been fishing. Seeing no prospect of the gale abating, the captain had cut his cable and put the vessel before the wind, preferring to run her on shore before night to riding there and foundering at her anchor. He lashed himself to the helm, sent all his men below but two, and nailed up the cabin doors. He had two large casks placed near the fore shrouds and lashed there. He then directed two of his best men to station themselves there, and lash themselves firmly to the casks, which were partly filled with blubber and oil from the fish. They had each a wooden ladle of about two feet long, and with these ladies they dipped up the blubber and oil and threw it up in the air as high as they could. The great violence of the wind carried it far to leeward, and, spreading over the water, made its surface smooth before her, and left a shining path behind; and although the sea would rise very high, yet the surface was smooth and never broke where the oil was. The vessel was preserved with all her crew.

THE ATTEMPT TO SHOOT THE QUEEN.

Roderick Maclean, who fired a pistol at her Majesty the Queen, on Thursday the 2nd inst., as her carriage was leaving the Windsor railway station for the Castle, was again brought up, yesterday (Friday) week, before the Mayor and magistrates of Windsor, at the Townhall, and was committed for his trial at the Berkshire Assizes, to be held next month at Reading. Our illustration shows the scene in the magistrates' court-room during the examination of one of the witnesses upon this occasion. His Royal Highness Prince Leopold, Duke of Albany, accompanied by General Sir Henry Ponsonby, was seated on the bench at the left hand of the Mayor, Mr. Joseph Devereux; and there were many spectators, including some ladies, who were accommodated with chairs below the reporters' table. The prisoner's dock is shown to the right hand of our engraving. The prosecution was conducted by Mr. Pollard and Mr. Stephenson, solicitors to the Treasury; while Mr. E. Thomas watched the case on behalf of the prisoner's family. The witnesses called on this second day were Mr. R. Errington, of Sunderland, who saw the prisoner aim his pistol at the Queen's carriage; Francis Orchard, the Queen's footman, Edward Dove, postilion, and James Hudson, outrider; the two Eton boys, Gordon Chesney Wilson and Leslie Murray Robertson; a policeman named Houghton, Mr. W. J. McClaspie, landlord of the Star and Garter at Windsor, and Mr. Frank Potter, a clerk of the railway station, who all saw the prisoner with the pistol in his hand; Mr. John Smythe, the station-master, and Mr. C. Noble, chief of the railway police; Mr. S. Warrill and his son, gunsmiths, of Portsmouth, from whom the prisoner bought the cartridges, and a pawnbroker's assistant there, who sold him the revolver on Feb. 22. Mr. Hayes, Superintendent of Police, also gave further evidence. The prisoner did not ask these witnesses any questions, but said he would reserve his defence. On the application of the solicitor for the Crown, he was committed for trial upon the charge of high treason, and was sent back to Reading Jail. The law as to attacks upon the Sovereign is very severe and precise. It is contained in two statutes, the first dealing with attempts to kill or hurt, the second with attempts to intimidate. The first statute, 36 Geo. III., c. 7, made perpetual by 57 Geo. III., c. 6, makes it treason to "compass, imagine, devise, or intend death, or any bodily harm tending to death;" the punishment for treason (mitigated of its attendant horrors by 54 Geo. III., c. 146, and 33 and 34 Vict., c. 23, s. 31), being death. The second statute, 5 and 6 Vict., c. 51, makes it a high misdemeanour "to discharge, or attempt to discharge, or point, aim, or present at or near the person of the Queen any gun, pistol, or any other description of firearms," whether loaded or not, "with intent . . . to alarm her Majesty," the punishment to which the offender is liable being penal servitude for seven years, or imprisonment for three years, with the additional liability "to be publicly or privately whipped as often and in such manner and form as the Court shall order and direct, not exceeding thrice." A subsequent statute, 25 Vict., c. 18, provides that "no offender shall be whipped more than once for the same offence;" but it may be doubted whether this provision applies generally, or is restricted to offences punishable by summary conviction.

JUMBO AND HIS FRIENDS.

The large male African elephant at the Zoological Society's Gardens in Regent's Park has gained weekly and daily in popularity, since his refusal to go to the Docks and embark for America, in accordance with the bargain for his sale to Mr. P. T. Barnum and others at New York. Never were such crowds of visitors to the Gardens at this early period of the season, all thronging to the elephant-house, or watching the huge animal in his customary promenade, in another part of the grounds, and offering him an unusual quantity and variety of eatable dainties, while the eagerness of children and young girls to ride on his back is beyond all precedent. The illustration of this ordinary performance engraved on our front page is from a photograph taken by Messrs. Briggs and Son, of the St. John's-wood School of Photography, 40, High-street, St. John's-wood. The number of people at the Gardens last Monday was twenty-four thousand; on Saturday, nearly seven thousand. There were 43,653 admissions last week.

The newly constructed box, or van, in which it is hoped Jumbo will soon be removed to the docks at Millwall, if he can once be confined in it, is a massive vehicle, of the dimensions necessary for an elephant that stands eleven feet high, and that weighs between five and six tons. The frame of the van is composed of solid balks, morticed, bolted, and over all heavily clamped with iron. The flooring is of three-inch planks, and the sides and roof are lined with inch-and-a-half deal. The van is of such strength as is calculated to resist twice or thrice the force that even this powerful brute could possibly bring to bear against it. Important changes have been made in its formation, and still more in the trolley upon which it is fixed; so that, instead of being four feet above the ground, the floor of the van will only be raised about eight inches. It is, for the present, sunk to the level of the ground, which has been dug out for the purpose, and the floor covered with gravel. Axles of enormous strength have been fitted with special boxes and wheels, the width of the lower structure being governed by that of the gateway through which the van is to leave the gardens. In the mean time, it is arranged as a kind of trap, with both ends left open, and being placed opposite the door of Jumbo's house, on the way to his exercise-ground and bathing-pool, he is becoming accustomed to walk through it, which he did for the first time on Saturday. The doors of the van will be suddenly closed upon him, at some convenient opportunity, when he is in chains, and the chains will be attached to the strong rings fixed inside the van, after which, it is thought, he cannot make any further resistance. The weight of elephant and van together will be about ten tons, which must be drawn by horses six miles through the streets from Camden Town to Millwall. Having reached the docks, a steam-crane will be employed to hoist up Jumbo in his box, and to put him into the ship which is to carry him to New York.

In the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice last week Mr. Justice Chitty refused to grant an injunction restraining the Council of the Zoological Society from selling this elephant and Mr. Barnum's agent from removing him to America. The injunction was applied for by Mr. Berkeley Hill, one of the Fellows of the society, whose counsel argued that it was not legally in the power of the Council so to dispose of animals valuable for the study of natural history. Dr. P. L. Selater, the secretary, and Mr. A. B. Bartlett, superintendent of the gardens, were called as witnesses to state that it would be inconvenient, and perhaps dangerous, to keep Jumbo there till the age when he would become liable to certain fits of rage. The application was, therefore, dismissed by the Court.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Next week will be a very busy one, as the flat-racing season will open with the Lincoln fixture, and the great body of the followers of the turf will hurry thence to Liverpool. At present, however, there is little to record, though the two days at Kempton Park at the end of last week demand a passing notice. Old Woodcock proved too good for Gimcrack and three others in a Hunters' Hurdle-Race; and then Glenluce, the Croydon winner, made short work of Meteor and St. Augustine for a Maiden Hurdle-Race; the last-named broke down so badly that he is scarcely likely to run again, a fact that will be a great relief to backers generally, for he has proved a sad deceiver since his two-year-old days. Solver (11 st. 5 lb.) beat a fair field for the Middlesex Handicap Steeplechase; and then the very smart Liliputian (11 st. 9 lb.), with odds on him, gave weight and a twenty lengths' beating to his five opponents for the March Hurdle Handicap. After the comparative failure of the big hurdles-race of late, the Kempton Park people were very fortunate to get a field of thirteen for their principal prize on Saturday, and no less than eleven of these found backers at one price or another. Perhaps Roscrea (11 st. 11 lb.) was the most fancied, but Antient Pistol (11 st. 2 lb.) also carried a great deal of money, and Suttler (12 st. 7 lb.) was again supported by his party, in spite of his heavy weight. The race was by no means a satisfactory one, as Glenluce (11 st. 10 lb.) fell heavily at the second flight of hurdles after turning out of the straight, and Suttler and Assenai (11 st. 5 lb.) fell over him. The jockeys of all three were severely shaken, but happily escaped any serious injury. Antient Pistol avoided a fall, but lost a great deal of ground by the contretemps, and was eventually beaten pretty cleverly by Theophrastus, (11 st. 6 lb.) who finished behind him at Croydon.

On Saturday last James Rix and George Thomas sculled over the championship course for £50 a side. The last named finished a good third to Rix for the junior prize at the Chinnery regatta, and since Rix's defeat by Bubeur it was generally imagined that he could not stay four miles and a quarter. For the last month, however, he has been under the care of the veteran Harry Kelly, who has improved him in a marked degree and taught him to adopt a much slower stroke without any loss of pace. They started by mutual consent, and Rix, at once going to the front, had the race in hand before they had gone a quarter of a mile, and won by eight lengths.

A six-days' walking-race took place at Sheffield last week, when George Littlewood, a native of that town, beat all the records from 170 miles and upwards, and covered the extraordinary distance of 531 miles 11 laps. He retired nearly three hours before the expiration of time, and appeared perfectly fresh; so there is no doubt that he could have walked some miles further had it been necessary.

The annual golf-match between Oxford and Cambridge was played at Wimbledon on the 9th inst., the latter University winning by one hole.

Last Saturday the annual football-match between England and Scotland was played at Glasgow, and was won by the Scotch players with five goals to one. The play was very good. The football-match between England and Wales was played on Monday afternoon at Wrexham, when the Welsh won by five goals to three, the play on both sides being admirable.

Mr. W. B. Tegetmeier, F.Z.S., gave the opening address on Wednesday, on the commencement of a course of lectures on Poultry Management at the Royal Horticultural Society's Council-room at South Kensington.

The Royal Botanic Society is turning its attention to the discovery of vegetable fibres suited for paper-making, and at a meeting of the society last Saturday Professor Bentley called attention to a number of paper-making materials which had been presented, and stated that experiments were being made for the utilisation of various kinds of vegetable fibre.

A despatch received at St. Petersburg from Irkutsk this week states that the correspondents of the New York Herald and Illustrated London News, with a sailor of the Jeannette named Noroe, and an interpreter of the Yakut language, left there on the 11th inst., via Yakutsk, for the mouth of the Lena, in order to search for the missing crew, and ascertain details with regard to their fate. Part of the sailors who were at Yakutsk have gone home via St. Petersburg. Lieutenant Danenhauer would leave for home March 13. The engineer, Melville, who has been at Yakutsk, left earlier, accompanied by natives of the Arctic seacoast.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

Not at any period, perhaps, in the history of the modern English stage has there occurred so entirely magnificent a Shakespearean revival as that of the tragedy of "Romeo and Juliet," which was produced at the Lyceum Theatre on Wednesday, the Eighth instant. The "installation" of the play with its superb accessories, its elaborately "built" scenery, its sumptuous dresses, and its almost unprecedentedly beautiful dioramic effects, has cost Mr. Henry Irving, I am told, more than six thousand pounds. The possibility of so lavish an outlay on a single play is readily understood when the splendour of the scenes and the costliness of the fabrics of which the costumes and draperies are composed are taken into account; but unstinted generosity in expenditure, albeit it is necessarily a very conspicuous feature, in the revived "Romeo and Juliet" does not by any means constitute the chief claim of the accomplished actor-manager to the admiration and applause of that public who are already indebted to Henry Irving for so many glorious tributes to the memory of Shakespeare, in the form of illustrations, at once powerful and picturesque, of his writings. "Romeo and Juliet" at the Lyceum has only to be seen to be warmly and gratefully appreciated, not only for its almost perfection in taste and symmetry, but for the loving thoughtfulness with which every line in the dialogue and every gesture in the action have been studied and thought out, culminating in an ensemble astonishing in its brilliance as a spectacle, and as delightful as it is instructive as a noble and refined dramatic performance.

There are those who set far greater store by excellent acting than they do by stately scenery, expensive dresses, and glittering pageants. On the production of the wonderfully complicated and extravagantly gorgeous masques which were given at Whitehall in the reigns of the two first Stuart Kings, it is possible that many more thousands of pounds were squandered than even Mr. Irving, who is Briarian-handed when there is a need for giving away, has spent on "Romeo and Juliet." For the actors in the Jacobean and Caroline masques were Princes of the Blood, and nobles of the highest rank, who did not scruple to fling away a whole year's revenue of their broad acres on the adornment of a doublet, or the trimmings of a farthingale. The Lord Chamberlain was the acting manager, and the King—and sometimes the purveyors, with whom he ran guily in debt—paid the piper. Yet, at this very same time, when the costly and clumsily elaborate tomfooleries devised by Ben Jonson and Inigo Jones were delighting the grandees and the gallants at Whitehall, "Romeo and Juliet" was being played in an inn-yard, or in a wooden hovel, on a rush-strewn stage, with no better scenery than a scrap of paper with "This is a Street," or "This is a Wood" scrawled upon it, pinned to a ragged piece of tapestry in the back ground. The Play's the Thing, after all; and that must be my sole apology for speaking of the dramatic personæ first, and leaving the scenery, dresses, and decorations as matters for subsequent examination.

Monaldi e Filippeschi, uom senza cura,
Color già tristi, e costor con sospetti.

Let us look on the Capulets and the Montagues as they were limned by Dante, and as they lived under Shakespeare's magic pencil—savage and restless, frenzied by terror and racked by suspicions; and by their own passions, foredoomed to be miserable. Here is Romeo, young, noble, shapely, rich, accomplished, yet normally as mournful and moody as the beggared Master of Ravenswood. The melancholy and the moodiness of the youthful Romeo seem to me to be most admirably portrayed by Mr. Irving. In the first scenes, he reminds you of the Shepherd in Virgil, who grew acquainted with Love, and found him a native of the rocks; and it would appear that he is less enamoured of the shadowy Rosaline, than with some abstraction which he arbitrarily assumes to be the object of an obscure sentiment. Rosaline is to him what Beatrice is to Dante and Laura to Petrarch, and, descending much lower, what Saccharissa was to Waller; and it was said long ago, I forget by whom, that if Shakespeare did not write his own sonnets, those occult outpourings must assuredly have been written by the ambiguous suitor of a problematical Rosaline. To my mind, the Romeo of Mr. Irving is divisible into three distinct phases. The first is that of the dreamy young Veronese patrician, probably an amateur of half mystic, half sensuous art—for this is, you will remember, altogether a Cinque-Cento play—possibly a parcel-poet, certainly fond of musing and moping over the Unattainable—a kind of Italian Endymion, in fine, pining for Diana-Rosaline in the moon. In this side of Romeo's character I like Mr. Irving without stint and without reserve; and I do not attach the value of a "gazetta"—which was the smallest, I believe, of the Venetian coins current in Verona—to the few mannerisms peculiar to himself, which mark his intonation and his gait, and with which, I take it, he is no more capable of dispensing than the Ethiop is of changing his skin or the leopard his spots. I never knew but one great actor who had absolutely no mannerisms; and that great actor, whose name I forbear to mention, was faultlessly classical, and, in addition, a calm and crystallised Bore. The second phase of the Irving Romeo presents itself when that romantic bachelor, at Old Capulet's "Ballo in Maschera," sees Juliet for the first time, and straightway, forgetting all about Rosaline in the moon, falls madly, passionately in love with Juliet. Believing firmly as I do in the existence—the frequent existence—of love at first sight, and believing also that what are called "love matches" often end in madness and despair, I see nothing unnatural or uncommon in Romeo's sudden and unquenchable passion for Capulet's delightful fourteen-year-old daughter. That Juliet should at once return the flame with interest is simply Shakespearean—that is to say, the most natural thing in the world. When a woman gives her heart away she draws out the entire balance of affection which she has lying at her banker's. She begs herself in order that she may have more to give away; and, in nine cases out of ten, the ungrateful curle whom she enriches is half unconscious of or half indifferent to the treasure which has been bestowed upon him. But Romeo is the exception. His love for Juliet is as spontaneous, as sincere, and as all-absorbing as the girl's love for him. As Romeo, the impassioned lover, Mr. Irving does not seem to have given unmingled satisfaction to all his critics. He satisfies me, because the perfect Romeo is, to my mind, a purely ideal one, whose picture would be far more satisfactorily realised by the painter than by the player; and because, on the whole, I would rather see Romeo performed by a consummate master of his art, saturated with Shakespearean knowledge and feeling every line and every word in the play, than by a good-looking, smock-faced young fellow who can make love to a beautiful girl well enough; but that is all. The truth is, as an accomplished but slightly elderly friend, my next neighbour in the stalls, said to me the other night, the fogies are "not in it" as regards the complete appreciation of the stage Romeo. Can we make love? We could as soon stand on our heads. Can we write love-letters? As soon could we write double acrostics or "appropriate mottoes" in the birthday albums. Touching the excellences or the imperfections of a dramatic Romeo, the boys and girls should have their say; but the truths they might unfold would surely be overlaid by an immense quantity of nonsense; and I shrink from calling in Edwin and Angelina to assist me in the composition of the "Playhouses."

With regard to the third phase of Mr. Irving's Romeo, I look upon it as, throughout, magnificent. The fiery Patrician who, albeit he has married a daughter of Capulet, spares none in his wrath when his Montague blood is up; the slayer of Tybalt, the half distraught inmate of Friar Laurence's cell, the banished Romeo, the despairing client of the Apothecary, the unwilling homicide of the County Paris,—all are delineated by Mr. Irving with surprising originality, truth, and grandeur. I have seen very few finer things on the stage than the impression of complete self-mastery, of inexorably concentrated volition engendered by irremediable despair, conveyed to the mind of the spectator by Mr. Irving in the scene in the street at Mantua when Balthasar conveys to him the tidings of Juliet's supposed death. The act-drop has risen on an unwontedly cheerful Romeo—

If I may trust the flattering eye of sleep,
My dreams presage some joyful news at hand;
My bosom's lord sits lightly in his throne;
And all this day an unaccustom'd spirit
Lifts me above the ground with cheerful thoughts.

A few minutes afterwards all is in the dust. Juliet, as Balthasar, and all men think, is dead. "Her body sleeps in Capel's monument," when Romeo, simply remarking, "Is it even so? Then I defy you stars!" instructs his servant to procure him ink and paper, and hire post-horses. Balthasar exclaims—

I do beseech you, Sir, have patience!
Your looks are pale and wild, and do import
Some misadventure.

But Mr. Irving, in the spirit of the truly great artist, has divined the verity inculcated long since by an illustrious surgeon, that "a strong man has all command over his muscles, but none over his blood." The paleness and wildness of Romeo's looks do not alter by one whit his calmness and brevity of speech nor his unalterable determination. His defiance of the stars is simply a cool and collected recognition of the Ananké—of the inevitable, of there being "no armour against Fate." A man who is tremendously agitated may turn ghastly pale, or scarlet red, or livid, or yellow, or green, as Napoleon III. is said by Mr. Kinglake to have turned at Solferino. His blood and his bile have all to do with that; and he cannot help himself. But his bodily muscles are entirely controlled by his muscular mind; and, be he pale or ruddy, he will go through with what he has to do, even to the bitter end. If the actor had not been really great in this scene he would have ranted.

I pass from Mr. Irving's most powerful and soulful impersonation to the Juliet of Miss Ellen Terry. Here again the boy and girl difficulty, the Edwin and Angelina trouble occurs. Juliet, according to the Nurse, is not quite fourteen years old. But an Italian fourteen means an English seventeen. There is, moreover, much, and fascinatingly much, that is ineffably girlish in Miss Terry. She cannot choose but to be always winning, trusting, and charming. Her unrivalled grace of action, the musical albeit slightly monotonous cadence of her recitative, the manner in which she floats rather than walks in her exquisitely contrived draperies—all these impart to her a loveliness which has been the portion of but very few actresses, and of which, among living artists, she may be said to be the sole possessor. In the balcony scene she is enchanting; in her pretty petulance with the Nurse she is inimitable; but, in the great bed-room scene, when she swallows the potion, even Edwin and Angelina must confess that Miss Ellen Terry is sadly disappointing. That she so disappoints her most ardent and her sincerest admirers is, artistically speaking, no fault of hers. She simply lacks the physique to deliver with sustained force a soliloquy of agonised terror. Jenny Lind was not physically strong enough for Norma, and Ellen Terry is not physically strong enough for Juliet in the potion scene.

I feel that it would be in the highest degree unjust to dismiss with a mere word of acknowledgment such artistically meritorious performances as the Nurse of Mrs. Stirling, the Mercutio of Mr. Edward Terriss, the Tybalt of Mr. C. Glenney, the Paris of Mr. G. Alexander, the Capulet of Mr. Howe, the Apothecary of Mr. T. Mead, and especially the Friar Laurence of Mr. Fernandez. To them, and to the sumptuous "mounting" of "Romeo and Juliet" generally, I shall return, at large, next week.

Reasons of space preclude me from doing more than recording the opening, on Saturday, the Eleventh, of the new Royal Avenue Theatre, in Northumberland-avenue. The staple of the highly successful opening entertainment was the well-known opera-bouffe of "Madame Favart," with Miss Florence St. John and M. Marius in the leading rôles. On Monday, the Thirteenth, Toole's Theatre witnessed another distinct and gratifying success in a new Comedy-Farce, called "Auntie," in three acts, by Mr. Byron, who is still, I grieve to say, very ill. Mr. Toole was in his highest spirits as the principal character. I shall resume my acquaintance with "Auntie" next week. G. A. S.

Sir Edward Watkin, M.P., Chairman of the South-Eastern Railway Company, on Saturday last, accompanied a number of distinguished visitors to the Channel Tunnel works at Shakespeare's Cliff, where special preparations had been made for their reception. The party numbered sixty-nine guests, amongst whom were the Premier and Mrs. W. E. Gladstone, Lord Salisbury, Sir Stafford and Lady Northcote. The guests afterwards proceeded to the Lord Warden Hotel at Dover, where they were entertained at luncheon. On Monday the works were visited by another party of ladies and gentlemen, among whom was the Duke of Sutherland. The Duke of Cambridge, with Sir Garnet Wolseley and a number of other officers, paid a visit to the tunnel on Tuesday and inspected the works. The boring continues satisfactorily, the total distance of the heading having now reached about 1250 yards.

Arrangements have, after some negotiation, been concluded between the National Rifle Association and the American National Rifle Association for two matches, the first of which will take place at Creedmoor in September next, and the second at Wimbledon in 1883. The committee of the National Rifle Association, in a circular recently issued, "call upon the foremost volunteer shots to practise with special reference to this contest, as nothing short of the best work of the best men the country can produce will ensure success to the British representatives." The teams will consist of twelve men a side—the distances being 200, 500, and 600 yards on one day, and 800, 900, and 1000 yards on another; seven rounds at each range per man. At 200 yards the position will be a standing one; at 500 and 600 yards, prone or sitting; at the longer ranges, any position. The weapon may be any military breechloader, and no cleaning or wiping out will be allowed except between the ranges.

MUSIC.

The series of operatic performances in English by the Carl Rosa Opera Company at Her Majesty's Theatre closed on Saturday evening, with a repetition of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." The cast included, as before, Madame Valleria as Senta, Miss J. Yorke as Mary, Mr. Ludwig as the Dutch Captain, Mr. Packard as Eric, and Mr. J. W. Turner as the Steersman; Mr. H. Pope having filled the character of Daland. Mr. Carl Rosa, who conducted, was enthusiastically received. The season began on Jan. 14, and, brief as it has been, it has included repeated performances of four of Wagner's operas—that just referred to, "Rienzi," "Lohengrin," and "Tannhäuser," this last having been recently produced by Mr. Rosa for the first time in English. Another specialty has been the first hearing in this country of Balfe's Italian opera, "Pittore e Duca," Englished as "Moro." The splendour with which Wagner's operas have been mounted, and the musical efficiency of the performances generally, are deserving of special recognition. The orchestra (headed by Mr. Carrodus) has been particularly fine, the chorus-singing beyond the average, and the chief duties of conductor have been very ably fulfilled by Mr. Randegger, who was efficiently replaced on some occasions by Mr. Pew, and in a few instances, as on the closing night, by Mr. Rosa. On Monday the company removed to the Standard Theatre, which it will occupy until the end of next week.

The concert of the Philharmonic Society last week—the third of the seventieth season—included several specialties. The programme opened with a new overture, composed by Mr. F. Corder, who conducted its performance. The work is entitled "Ossian," and was intended originally as the prelude to a grand opera on the subject of Fingal; and, accordingly, its general tone is sombre and romantic, some picturesque contrasts being obtained by striking orchestral varieties. It was very well received. Next came a choral ode entitled "Nanie," the composition of Herr Brahms. This is a setting of Schiller's lines, which have also been used for a similar purpose by the late Hermann Goetz. Brahms's work contains some effective writing, chiefly in the contrapuntal style; the orchestral surroundings being well calculated to enhance the effect of the somewhat monotonous vocal harmony. Another novelty at the concert was a contralto scena (with orchestra), "Che vuoi, mio cor?" by Mendelssohn—still remaining in manuscript. The piece was composed in 1824, when he was about fifteen, and is more juvenile in style than other works of that period: some of which, indeed, are worthy of his riper years. Although admirably sung by Madame Patey, it produced but little effect. The remaining specialty was Rubinstein's "Die Nixie" ("The Water Nymph") for contralto solo (Madame Patey) and chorus, with orchestra, in which there is much effective and graceful writing in each respect. Herr Joachim played Mendelssohn's fine violin concerto, and the dry Fantasia by Schumann (op. 131) with his well-known excellence: the other items of the programme having been Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, and Spohr's overture to "Jessonda."

Madame Schumann played, for the second time this season, at last week's Saturday Afternoon Popular Concert, her solo being Beethoven's pianoforte sonata "Les Adieux, l'Absence et le Retour," which she rendered with grand effect. At the following Monday evening concert the great pianist played the same composer's "Sonata quasi Fantasia" in E flat, also with fine effect. Herr Joachim has continued to lead the quartet party.

Mr. W. Macfarren gave the second of his three orchestral concerts at St. James's Hall last Saturday evening, when his "Pastoral Overture" and his symphony in B flat were performed. Both works had previously been heard more than once, and commented on. The orchestral playing in these, and in Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture and Mendelssohn's overture, "Scherzo," "Notturmo," and Wedding March from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, was of first-rate excellence. Madame Patey contributed vocal pieces.

The Sacred Harmonic Society gave Haydn's "Creation" with great effect at last week's concert. The choruses were finely sung—especially "Awake the harp," and "The Heavens are telling." The soprano and tenor solos were rendered with much refinement, respectively, by Miss M. Davies and Mr. Lloyd, and those for the bass with resonant power by Signor Foli. During the illness of Sir Michael Costa, Mr. Sinton acts as conductor. The next performance—on March 31—will consist of Sir M. Costa's "Eli."

The Royal Amateur Orchestral Society gave the first concert of the tenth season at the Albert Hall last Saturday evening.

Miss Josephine Agabeg, a meritorious pianist, gave her evening concert, on Tuesday, at Steinway Hall.

An interesting pianoforte recital was given by Mdlle. Krebs and Miss Zimmermann at St. James's Hall on Wednesday afternoon, when the programme consisted of four-hand music, some for one piano and some for two instruments.

This week's London Ballad Concert programme included a new patriotic song, "Hands All Round," the words by Tennyson, arranged by Mr. C. V. Stanford, and sung by Mr. Santley. The programme was an excellent one.

Mr. and Mrs. Furlong gave their concert on Thursday evening at the Marlborough Rooms; that of Mdlle. Rosina Isidor being announced for this evening at St. James's Hall.

An Irish Festival Concert took place at the Royal Albert Hall yesterday (Friday) evening, under the direction of Mr. William Carter; and a similar entertainment took place, at the same time, at St. James's Hall—both being in celebration of St. Patrick's Day.

The last of Mr. Sims Reeves's concerts at St. James's Hall—previous to his resuming his provincial tour—will take place on Tuesday evening next.

The Highbury Philharmonic Society will give the second concert of the new season at the local Athenæum next Monday evening, when the music of Weber's "Euryanthe" will be performed to a new English version of the libretto by Mr. W. W. Thornthwaite. The occasion will be an interesting one, Weber's opera (one of his greatest productions) being so little known here, and its performance in German being one of the features of the forthcoming scheme at Drury Lane Theatre.

In consequence of the success attending the Thursday evening concerts at the Royal Victoria Coffee Hall, it is proposed to give an additional concert in the week. A series of Monday evening concerts will be started, and the programme will consist of concerted and instrumental music, interspersed with recitals in costume. The first concert will take place next Monday, under the direction of the Paggi Family, from the Crystal Palace, and Signor Gilardoni will give the second.

The Duke of Westminster, Sir Stafford Northcote, and the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol have joined the Popular Ballad Concert Committee. The Duke of Westminster has given £20. A free sacred concert was given by the committee on Sunday, at the Foresters' Hall, Clerkenwell. The second series of Monday Evening Popular Concerts will be resumed at the same hall next Monday.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

Paris, Tuesday, March 14.

The Paris season is now at its height, and, as the Thursday of Mid Lent, the Mi-Carême, approaches, there seems to be a reduplication of festivities in all ranks of society, official, unofficial, literary, artistic, proletarian, and demi-mondain. According to the English fashion, the season here is beginning later and later every year; while the balls and receptions are beginning later and later every night. The visit of the Empress of Austria has not caused any particular sensation. A Parisian worldly wit has told us to beware of women who ride much and well, and as the Empress has done little else but take a daily ride and drive in the Bois de Boulogne ever since she arrived, the Parisians have only been able to judge her from a point of view on which they are, perhaps, prejudiced. Yesterday President Grévy met her Majesty in the Bois and expressed a hope that she would return next year. But, after all, with the splendid spring weather that we are now enjoying, with the real beauty of the city itself heightened by a wealth of flowers in every street and almost in every house, and with that happy facility that the Parisians have for "loafing" and enjoying the mere act of "loafing," the presence of one or a dozen Sovereigns is a matter of perfect indifference to the vast majority of folk. For that matter, Sarah Bernhardt, Jeanne Granier, or the gracefully corseted figure of the Marquis de Caux would any day hold their own as centres of Parisian curiosity against a crowned head travelling incognito.

Bontoux for ever! Hurrah for the New Union Générale! All persons interested in the old Union have received a communication from the stockholders' committee recommending a scheme of M. Bontoux for resuscitating the company, or rather for forming a new one. The New Union now in course of formation—500f. shares—will simply take up the concessions of the old society, carry all its plans into execution, and give the shareholders of the old Union a portion of the profits. M. Bontoux will shortly publish the statutes of the new society and the dates of subscription. Meanwhile, M. Bontoux has still to justify himself in the court of correctional police.

M. Léon Say announces that the Budget of expenses, ordinary and extraordinary, for 1883 will amount to 3,285,376,098f. By dividing this sum by the number of inhabitants of France, we arrive at the result that the nation annually expends about 100f. a head. This estimate is more than three hundred millions less than the Budget drawn up by M. Allain-Targé, the grand Minister of Finance of the grand Gambetta Ministry. But M. Allain-Targé intended to buy up the railways, to convert the Five per Cents, and to raise a loan of twelve hundred millions, whereas M. Léon Say takes as his watchword: "No conversion! No buying up of the railways!" However, the question of the purchase of the railways by the State is not yet settled. Indeed, an important Parliamentary Commission of twenty-two members has been appointed to study this important and much disputed matter.

Another railway question is also being hotly discussed by the parties interested. It is the question of the Paris Metropolitan Railway, an inquiry into which is being made at the Prefecture of the Seine. An elevated railway, say some, will spoil the aspect of the town and destroy those effects of perspective which Baron Haussmann spent so much money in obtaining. On the other hand, an underground railway will impair the stability of the houses, and interfere seriously with the sewers and gas-pipes. These last objections are, of course, puerile. The project now under consideration is for the establishment of three daylight routes connecting the north, west, and south environs with the centre of the town. Tunnels will, of course, be necessary only in the centre of Paris; and the longest will only be 1850 metres.

The present Chamber of Deputies has not from the beginning inspired respect, and perhaps now it inspires still less respect than ever, owing to the unseemly zeal that the deputies show in voting privileges for themselves, such as increase of pay, free passes on all railway lines, &c. And when they do consent to work seriously they prefer trivial measures to serious ones—as, for instance, a bill for abolishing duelling to the bill for legalising divorce. If the bill against duelling be passed, it will only have the effect of increasing the travelling expenses of the combatants, who will have to go to Luxembourg or Switzerland, instead of settling their differences comfortably in the woods of Vincennes or Boulogne. Duelling, as it is at present practised, is a very innocent affair. In France some three score duels are fought in a year, and death results about once in a thousand cases. It would be just as logical to suppress the Paris, Lyons, and Mediterranean Railway Company: apropos of which I must record the conclusion of the inquiry into the terrible accident that took place at Charenton last September. Three men have been found responsible for the disaster—the station-master of Maisons Alfort and two pointsmen, who have been condemned to six, eight, and twelve months' imprisonment respectively.

Decidedly this is the golden age of lotteries. Last week I announced the lottery of the Dramatic Artists' Mutual Aid Society, this week I have to announce a colossal lottery of ten millions of francs and ten millions of tickets, which has just obtained the authorisation of Government. This lottery, organised by the Union Centrale des Beaux-Arts, is intended to provide funds for the erection of a museum on the model of that of South Kensington. The site chosen is that of the old Cour des Comptes, which was burnt down during the Commune, and that of the adjoining barracks on the Quai d'Orsay. In the matter of industrial art, the French are at length beginning to bestir themselves, and to acknowledge the immense progress made by their neighbours in this direction. But the great obstacle in the way of reform in France is red-tape and conservative administration. The other day, for instance, the Louvre spent 35,000f. to buy some frescoes by Sandro Botticelli from the Villa Lemmi, near Florence, while it refused to pay a twenty-pound note for two exquisite Chinese paintings on which one of the Government inspectors of Fine Arts had been requested to draw up a report. The inspector in question did make a report, and a favourable one. Then, when the "Conservatoire," or administrative Council of the Louvre came finally to decide, a venerable Admiral, the curator of the Marine Museum, was appealed to, in his quality of a traveller, to pronounce on these specimens of barbarous (!) art. The Admiral said he did not think much of them, and the paintings were refused. And that is the way things are managed at the Louvre. The curators recognise no merits in any painting except that of the old masters. As for the modern painters, they are refused admission altogether, or left to rot in cellars. One of the Courbets bought for the State last autumn has been seriously injured through the curator having neglected to unroll the canvas on its arrival at the Louvre. It was found a few days ago thrown in a corner! It is to be hoped that the French South Kensington will be put in the hands of more competent administrators than the curators of the Louvre. T. C.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

The usually humdrum proceedings of the House of Lords, prosaic as the modern frock coats the peers lounge in, were momentarily relieved yesterday week by the appearance of Earl Sydney at the table in the uniform of the Lord Steward. This official garb was assumed by his Lordship (to the manner born in matters of Court ceremony, by reason of his former long tenure of the office of Lord Chamberlain), in order, presumably, to add weight to his recital of her Majesty's gracious answer to the Parliamentary Address of sympathy presented that morning to the Queen by the Prime Minister. This was the reply the noble Earl read:—

My Lords and Gentlemen,—I received with heartfelt satisfaction the loyal and dutiful Address from my two Houses of Parliament. I am thankful to the Almighty whose merciful care has protected me and my beloved child from danger. In my sincere desire to promote the welfare of my people I am comforted and supported by the continued assurance of your attachment to my person and my throne.

To South Africa and Borneo was the attention of their Lordships directed on Monday. Trouble is brewing on the Transvaal borders. At the invitation of the Earl of Carnarvon, the Earl of Kimberley read a seasonable despatch from Sir Hercules Robinson counselling union between the Home Government and the Colonial authorities with regard to the attitude to be adopted towards the chief Masupha. The Secretary for the Colonies furthermore cited a telegram, dated March 12, which conveyed the news that General Joubert, the Boer Commander, had started on an expedition to punish a disaffected Kaffir chief residing on the western border of the Transvaal, but had been anticipated by the said Skalafin, who had gone by another route to Pretoria to make peace. The telegram added that "daily fighting and bloodshed," which may "extend and last long," was taking place outside the borders of the Transvaal. It will, at least, be of interest to learn what Cetewayo has to say with respect to these native wars when he becomes the lion of the London season.

There can be little doubt that the Eldorado of Borneo will profit by the brief yet pregnant conversation of Monday last. Twitted by Lord Lamington with borrowing the policy of the late Lord Beaconsfield in so far as the acquirement of Borneo was concerned, Earl Granville favoured the House of Lords with a geographical and historical dissertation, the finish of which suggested that the Foreign Secretary would have been fully qualified to supply the "Encyclopædia Britannica" with a chapter on Borneo. Colonised at first by the English, Dutch, Spanish, and Portuguese, Borneo was found to be so rich a country at the beginning of the century that England and Holland, and later on Spain, found it expedient to enter into diplomatic correspondence respecting the island. In our own times, Lord Derby and the Marquis of Salisbury found it necessary to uphold the rights of England over the claims of Spain to Borneo; and Earl Granville has but followed up their policy in sanctioning the Charter to the Borneo Company.

Earl Cairns has exhibited more legislative zeal in the Upper House than the Government. The noble Earl on Tuesday piloted both his Settled Land Bill and Conveyancing Bill through Committee. The present occupant of the woolsack, on his side, had to be content the same day with assuring Lord Stanley of Alderley that he had but acted according to the law in inviting Captain Pearson to remove his name from the Commission of the Peace at Macclesfield, and in not interfering with the three other Macclesfield magistrates censured by the Bribery Commissioners.

The Earl of Redesdale's Parliamentary Declaration Bill is down for second reading on Thursday next; but the noble Earl does not appear to have received much encouragement to proceed with his measure.

The House of Commons, with regret it must be admitted, has but furnished fresh and stronger reasons why the rules of debate should be forthwith reformed with a vigorous hand. Necessary as Mr. Gladstone's Resolution against Parliamentary inquiry into the Irish Land Act may have been deemed by the Ministry as a protest against the appointment of Lord Donoughmore's Committee, the discussion of the Government motion indubitably occupied much valuable time, which might profitably have been taken up with the consideration of the Closure. The prolonged discussion, indeed, did not terminate till the small hours of Friday week, when the Marquis of Hartington's clear summing-up having been boldly replied to by Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Gibson's amendment of "the previous question" was negatived by the decisive majority of 84—303 against 219; and by the slightly diminished majority of 68—303 to 235—was Mr. Gladstone's appended Resolution adopted, amid Ministerial cheers and Opposition counter-cheering:—

That Parliamentary inquiry at the present time into the working of the Irish Land Act tends to defeat the operation of that Act, and must be injurious to the interests of good government in Ireland.

The Government can plume themselves upon one good result of the protracted debate on the Irish Land Act; and that is the warm support they received from some Irish members, who, whilst their patriotism has been of longer and stronger growth than the perverted advocacy of the irreconcilable section of Home Rulers, are not so lost to all sense of decency and fair play as to withhold their generous recognition of the great work her Majesty's Ministers have done with the view of restoring contentment and prosperity to Ireland. On the other hand, the Hibernian members who have imported into the House the manners of a Pig Market have become such habitual offenders that any excess of gross language they may indulge in does but sink them still lower in the opinion of the great majority of hon. members. Still, it has to be recorded that the most incorrigible of these hardened offenders has let drop such indefensible aspersions on the character of Mr. Forster that he has more than once brought down upon himself prompt rebuke from the long-suffering Speaker.

The Prime Minister would require more than the patience of Job to bear with composure the taunts and rudenesses he has had to submit to. Though provoked now and again to a natural outburst of indignant remonstrance against some more than usually insolent attack from the Opposition bench, Mr. Gladstone has shown remarkable forbearance—as a rule, far too much, some think. Whether, confident in the possession of an overwhelming majority ready to support him faithfully on most questions that arise, Mr. Gladstone might not himself greatly contribute to the restoration of order, and to the acceleration of the transaction of business in the Lower House, by putting on the bolder front which a Premier in his position is well entitled to assume—that is a point for the right hon. gentleman to decide. Were Mr. Gladstone to assume this firm attitude, there can be little doubt the country would hail the change with satisfaction. Self-sufficient mediocrities have too long trifled with the dignity of the House. As the Prime Minister was himself driven to say on Monday, "Our entire arrangements for conducting public business are as far as possible from being creditable." In brief, as Mr. Bright declared on another occasion, the Parliamentary machine is out of gear, and needs at once to be thoroughly repaired.

The time that might usefully have been occupied on Monday evening in amply discussing the Army Estimates was taken up by a variety of subjects, which could just as well have been considered on any other occasion. It was not till past midnight that Mr. Childers was able to rise to introduce his military Budget. The sum total the Secretary for War asked for the Army expenses of the ensuing year was £15,500,000—half a million less than last year. Reviewing the changes being made by the War Office; Mr. Childers mentioned the increased grants to the Militia and the Volunteers, the £15,000 additional pay to non-commissioned officers in the Army, and the formation of eleven fixed Artillery depôts near the coasts, among the noteworthy features. He was glad to say recruiting was going on satisfactorily; the Reserves were strong, numbering at present 25,121 men; the Autumn Manœuvres would be revised this year—at a cost of £30,000; 90,000 Martini-Henry rifles would be issued this year to the Militia, and an instalment of 4500 to the Volunteers. Mr. Childers, after many hours of wrangling, during which there were some lively passages of arms between Mr. Gladstone and Earl Percy, and after two divisions, secured the vote of £4,600,000 for men on the stroke of four o'clock on Tuesday morning.

Tuesday night saw yet another comparatively early count-out. And yet Government business is sadly in arrears! Mr. Broadhurst's airing of the grievances of Navy fitters afforded Mr. Trevelyan the opportunity of indulging in a kind of preliminary canter, preparatory to the introduction later in the week of the Navy Estimates—£10,483,901, a net decrease of £221,130 on last year's Estimates.

On Wednesday, Mr. McCoan prevailed upon the House to read a second time his bill to assimilate the Irish Municipal Franchise to that of England; and the other business comprised the partial consideration of the Irish County Courts Bill (the debate on which was adjourned on the motion of Mr. Gibson), and Mr. Monk's measure for rendering judgments pronounced in one part of the kingdom valid in any other part. But it may safely be said that it is upon the resumed debate on the Parliamentary Procedure Resolutions that the attention of the Commons is mainly fixed.

MENTONE AND ITS NEIGHBOURHOOD.

Her Majesty the Queen, with her Royal Highness Princess Beatrice, left Windsor Castle on Tuesday morning to cross the Channel by way of Portsmouth and Cherbourg, and to travel through France to the Mediterranean shore, arriving at Mentone on Thursday evening. The railway train would there set them down at a private station which has been specially constructed for the convenience of the Royal visitors close to the Château des Rosiers, Mr. Charles Henfrey's seaside villa, which will be their residence during the next few weeks.

Some Illustrations of Mentone, and of the Château des Rosiers, have appeared in this Journal, but we now present additional views of places in the neighbourhood, which the Queen and the Princess are likely to visit. Villafranca, as it was always called while it belonged to the Kingdom of Victor Emmanuel, though, since the annexation of Nice to the French Empire, in 1860, it has taken the French name of Villefranche, is a short distance east of Nice, on the way from that town to Monaco by road or by rail; and it is about thirteen miles from Mentone. It is situated at the head of an inlet, two miles long, which forms a capacious and sheltered harbour of refuge, and which has frequently given accommodation to the French, British, and other naval squadrons. The peninsula of St. Jean, partly inclosing this harbour, from Beaulieu to the lighthouse at its southern extremity, presents very picturesque scenery; the cliffs of reddish sandstone being varied with groves of olive, orange, and lemon trees, and with divers other forms of vegetation. Monaco, seven or eight miles distant, singularly built upon a rocky promontory, with its ancient castellated Palace, the modern fashionable additions, and the Casino of Monte Carlo, which has its attractions for a certain class of visitors, need scarcely be described upon this occasion.

The bay of Mentone, sequestered by Cape St. Martin from those resorts of frivolity and dissipation, has already been spoken of, and we have referred to Dr. Henry Bennet's volume, "Winter and Spring on the Shores of the Mediterranean," for a minute and intimate acquaintance with that delightful part of the Riviera. The town of Mentone has no particular charms, but English visitors need not spend much of their time in its narrow, steep, and comfortable streets; they will here find, on Sundays, an English Protestant Episcopal Church, which is the subject of one of our Illustrations. The temporary abode of her Majesty and the Princess is at some distance to the east of the town. Still farther on in that direction, beneath the sheltering mountain range of the Berceau, on the road to Ventimiglia and Bordighera, is the Pont St. Louis, which marks the present Italian frontier. This bridge crosses a ravine, 160 ft. deep, which is cleft by a mountain torrent, and the bottom and sides of which are covered with masses of rock, and heaps of stones, in all manner of irregular shapes, partly bare and rugged, partly overgrown with a profusion of flowering plants. Higher up the valley is Grimaldi, a quaint rustic hamlet, with a Saracenic tower, and the garden formed by Dr. Bennet, who has much to say of the beauties of his favourite place of resort. Below the Pont St. Louis, on the seashore, are the curious Bone Caves, apparently similar to those on the Devonshire coast near Brixham and Torquay. They are of much interest to students of geology and palæontology, as they were found, some twenty-three years ago, to contain the bones of stags, sheep, boars, horses, wolves, dogs, cats, rabbits, a large carnivorous animal, and the Bos Primigenius, with flint knives, spear-heads, and other human implements, and the remains of charcoal fires. A view of these Bone Caves is included among our Illustrations of Mentone.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, having been ordered by his medical adviser to take a few weeks' rest, has gone to the South of France.

The parish church of Sundridge, Kent, was on the 9th inst. discovered to be on fire, and, notwithstanding the combined efforts of the local and Sevenoaks fire brigades the two chancels and altar, together with the roof, were destroyed. The fire is supposed to have been caused by the heating apparatus.

Captain Maude, R.N., presided on the 9th inst. at the annual meeting of the Church Association, at which a report was adopted describing the action taken during the year, and expressing the determination of the council to persevere in the policy which represented the principles of the organisation.

The parishioners of Martinhoe and Trentishoe, North Devon, have presented their Rector, the Rev. C. Scriven, with an illuminated address and a purse of £93, from themselves and other friends, as an expression of their esteem and their regret at his resignation through ill-health.

A meeting of the unbenefticed clergy in the Archdeaconry of London was held yesterday week in promotion of the claims of the unbenefticed clergy to vote for proctors in Convocation. Resolutions were agreed to to the effect that the recent proposals of Convocation with regard to the enfranchisement of the unbenefticed clergy are inadequate, and that they offer less than Convocation had already recommended; also that a reform in the direction of a largely increased representation of parochial clergy was required.

Mr. E. J. Physick, sculptor, has been commissioned to execute the sculptured marble tablets to be erected in the beautiful porch, now being added, from the design of Mr. Mileham, architect, to the Church of St. Andrew, Biarritz, as a memorial of the British Army under Wellington, 1813-14. These memorials will contain the name of every officer in the British Army and German Legion who fell in the campaign between Oct. 7, 1813, and April 14, 1814, together with the place and date of death of each; they also will record the British loss of non-commissioned officers and men, under the heading of their regiments, with the date of each engagement.

On Tuesday the adjourned meeting of the parishioners of St. Saviour's, Southwark, was held to consider the report of the special committee on the Bishop of Rochester's scheme for disposing of the Church-rate grievance. The committee recommended the acceptance of the Bishop's offer to purchase the advowson for £7000, but advising the retention of all Church property and the fabric. A resolution to refer the scheme back to the committee, with instructions to prepare a bill based thereon, and to include the Bishop's suggestions, was carried, whereupon Mr. Stevens demanded a poll of the parish as to whether the scheme should be accepted or not. This morning the result was declared as follows:—For the scheme, 363; against it, 348. The proposal has thus been carried by a majority of 15.

The subscription list for an American memorial window in Westminster Abbey to Dean Stanley has been filled, and the fund—over 5000 dollars—will be transmitted to the Westminster Committee.—Leafield church, near Witney, Oxfordshire, built about twenty years ago from plans by the late Sir G. G. Scott, has, by the instrumentality and with the most liberal contributions of the Rev. J. H. Worsley, been enriched by a handsome east window, the gift of the Rev. J. H. Worsley, formerly Vicar, and now of Bromley College, Kent; and the work has been designed and carried out by Messrs. Wailes and Straung, of Newcastle-on-Tyne.—The fine five-light east window of St. Mary's Church, Swansea, has been filled with a splendid specimen of Munich glass, the subject represented being the Sermon on the Mount. The work is by the same artists who lately executed the east window of St. James's Church, Swansea, and that of the church at Cockett, Messrs. Mayer and Co., of New Bond-street.

The effort that is being made by the Bishop of Gloucester, the Archdeacon of Bristol, and others for the evangelisation of Bristol promises to be successful. A sum of £47,000 was asked for, of which £26,000 has been already promised. The Mayor, who is a Dissenter, gives a generous support; and at his request the Head Master of Clifton preached an eloquent sermon before the Corporation, in which he set forth in vivid colours the irreligious condition of the masses of our cities. Last week the first public meeting in support of the scheme was held at the Merchant Venturers' Hall, the Bishop, at the request of the Mayor, presiding. The list of subscriptions included the Bishop, £1000; the Mayor, £250; the High Sheriff, £500; the Society of Merchant Venturers, £2500; William Baker and Sons (Redcliff), £1000; Miles, Cave, Bailie, and Co., £1000; Thomas Daniel and Sons, £500; and £5 5s. annually; J. W. Dod, £500; Alderman Edwards, £500, and £20 annually; Mrs. William Gibbs (Tyntesfield), £500, and £30 annually; Richard Vaughan, £500; W. K. Wait, £500; the Rev. J. M. Wilson, £500, and £50 annually; Archdeacon Norris, £250; Mr. A. C. Pass, site for church on Windmill-hill; Sir Greville Smith, £500; Mr. Lewis Fry, M.P., £100; Mr. A. Gibbs, £3000; Mr. R. Hassell, £150; the Rev. R. W. Randall, £500, &c.

In preparation for the work incident to the forthcoming review at Portsmouth, about 8000 of the metropolitan volunteers were under arms last Saturday, some of them drilling at Wimbledon and other open spaces near London, while others were engaged in route marching. It is understood that at least seven regiments will arrive at Portsmouth on Good Friday, and be quartered in barracks and forts.

An exciting whale-hunt is reported from the west coast of the Shetland Islands, where 300 whales were captured by a fleet of small skiff-fishing-boats peculiar to these islands. About 400 or 500 whales known as "bottle noses" were observed sporting about in Weedale Bay, and as soon as the news spread throughout the surrounding district every available boat was manned by fishermen, farmers, and crofters, and a general chase of what is locally known as whale-diving commenced. For some hours the chase continued, and ultimately 300 were stranded. The whales have been sold for £300.

THE COURT.

Her Majesty, who has continued well since her recent alarm, went a few days ago, accompanied by Princess Beatrice, to the College of the Jesuit Fathers, at Beaumont, Old Windsor, to receive from the students—some 200 in number—a congratulatory address, to which she replied; and the Rev. Father Cassidy, Rector, was presented to her. The National Anthem was sung, and choice bouquets were presented to the Royal visitors. Congratulations have also been given from all quarters of the globe, including an address presented by the Duke of Edinburgh, Master of Trinity House, from the Corporation; and also a joint address from the Houses of Lords and Commons. The Queen has written a most touching letter to "Her People" expressive of her deep feeling of the outburst of enthusiastic and affectionate loyalty called forth from all classes of her empire, as well as by the universal sympathy shown by Sovereigns and people of other nations, upon the safety of herself, her daughter, and her people in the moment of danger; and "to all, from the highest to the humblest," she conveys "her warmest and most heartfelt thanks." We give her Majesty's letter entire on page 267.

The churching of the Duchess of Connaught was performed on the 8th inst. by the Dean of Windsor in the private chapel of Windsor Castle, the Queen and the Duke of Connaught being present.

The Royal christening was solemnised with due state last Saturday in the private chapel by the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Dean of Windsor. The sponsors were the Queen, the Emperor of Germany, represented by the German Ambassador; the Crown Princess of Germany, represented by Princess Christian; Princess Frederick of Prussia, represented by Princess Beatrice; the Duchess of Cambridge, represented by Princess Louise of Lorne; the Prince of Wales; Prince Charles of Prussia, represented by the Duke of Albany; and Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia, represented by the Duke of Edinburgh. The Princess of Wales, the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, the Duchess of Edinburgh, and Prince Christian were present, with Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud of Wales, Prince Alfred of Edinburgh, and Princesses Victoria and Louise of Schleswig-Holstein. The ladies and gentlemen in waiting on the various Royal personages were in attendance; and the chief members of her Majesty's household were present. The infant, when the baptism was to be received, was taken from the nurse by Lady Adela Larking (one of the ladies in waiting to the Duchess of Connaught) and placed in the arms of her Majesty, who gave her to the Archbishop. The infant received the names of Margaret Victoria Augusta Charlotte Norah. The christening party afterwards went to the Green Drawing-room, where the baptismal register was attested; and the Queen received the company invited to the ceremony. Subsequently luncheon was served for the Royal family in the Oak Room, and for the other visitors in the dining-room. At the collation the Lord Steward gave the toasts:—"Her Royal Highness Princess Margaret of Connaught" and "The Queen." Morning dress with evening coats was worn, the gentlemen of the household wearing the Windsor uniform. Her Majesty's dinner party the previous evening included Princess Louise of Lorne, Princess Beatrice, the Duke of Connaught, Prince Leopold, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Marquis and Marchioness of Salisbury, Viscount and Viscountess Barrington, Lady Waterpark, General Viscount Bridport, and Colonel Sir Howard and Lady Elphinstone.

The Queen, Princess Louise, Princess Beatrice, the Duke of Connaught, and Prince Leopold attended Divine service on Sunday, performed in the private chapel by the Rev. Boyd Carpenter, Vicar of Christ Church, Lancaster-gate.

Monday being the anniversary of the wedding day of the Duke and Duchess of Connaught and Strathearn, the band of the Scots Guards played under the windows of their Royal Highnesses in the morning. Princess Christian lunched with the Royal family, and Princess Louise of Lorne returned to town.

For a few days previous to her Majesty's departure from Windsor the Royal dinner circle was augmented by numerous visitors.

The Queen, travelling as Countess of Balmoral, accompanied by Princess Beatrice, left the castle on Tuesday morning en route for Mentone. The journey throughout was made in perfect privacy, except that at Portsmouth Dockyard the children of the Royal Seamen and Marines' Orphan Schools and Home were paraded on the jetty to see her Majesty embark on board the Victoria and Albert for Cherbourg. Her Majesty will stay at Mentone for a month.

Messrs. Bolland and Sons, of Chester, are to manufacture the bride-cake for the marriage of Prince Leopold. The same firm made the cakes for the weddings of the Prince of Wales, and Princesses Alice, Helena, and Louise.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales introduced a pleasing incident into their children's lives yesterday week, upon the nineteenth anniversary of their Royal Highnesses wedding-day, in the form of a juvenile ball, at which the parents of most of the children invited were present, the 500 invitations to Marlborough House including scions of the chief representative families of the kingdom. In the Royal circle were Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud of Wales, the Duke of Edinburgh, the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke and Duchess of Teck and their four children, and Count and Countess Gleichen and their family. The Prince and Princess were at the opening of the Royal Avenue Theatre on Saturday evening. Their Royal Highnesses, with their daughters, attended Divine service on Sunday; and on Monday the Prince presided at the second annual meeting of the governors of the City of London and Guilds of the London Technical Institute at Mercers' Hall. In the afternoon their Royal Highnesses, with the Princesses of Wales, were present at Mr. Muybridge's exhibition at the Royal Institute, Albemarle-street, of his instantaneous photographs of animals in motion; and in the evening the Prince and Princess went to the Criterion Theatre. Princess Louise of Lorne and the Duke of Edinburgh lunched with their Royal Highnesses on Tuesday. In the evening the Prince and Princess went to Toole's Theatre. The Countess Wimborne gave a dance on Wednesday evening to meet their Royal Highnesses. The Prince has dined with Mr. Henry Petre in Berkeley-square.

His Royal Highness will accompany the Duke of Cambridge and Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar to Portsmouth on Easter Monday for the Volunteer Review.

Princess Christian will open a bazaar during Whitsun week in aid of the Church and Mission School funds connected with the district of St. Paul's, Broke-road, Haggerston.

Monday being the anniversary of the terrible death of the Emperor Alexander II. of Russia, there was a solemn funeral service at the Russian chapel in Welbeck-street, which the Duke of Edinburgh attended. The Duchess visited the Duchess of Connaught at Windsor Castle on Tuesday, returning to town on Wednesday. Her Royal Highness and the Duke were present at the students' concert of the National Training School for Music in the afternoon at the Royal Albert Hall. Extensive preparations have been made at the borough of Pembroke, and at the adjacent town of Pembroke Dock, in anticipation of the visit of the Duke and Duchess to-day (Saturday), when the Majesty is to be launched, and christened by the Duchess. His Royal Highness will open the International Competitive Exhibition of Ships' Models to be held at Fishmongers' Hall in May.

The Duke of Connaught presided at the thirtieth anniversary of the Hospital for Sick Children, Great Ormond-street, held at Willis's Rooms. His Royal Highness and the Duchess of Connaught leave Windsor next Monday for Biarritz.

On Thursday Prince Leopold, Duke of Albany, was elected president of the Bachelors' Club, and entertained at luncheon by Mr. William Gillett (chairman of the committee), the Duke of Teck and other members being present. Subsequently the committee presented his Royal Highness with a silver toilet service of the Louis XVI. period, as a wedding gift. The Prince presided in the evening at the festival in aid of the funds of the National Hospital for the Paralyzed and Epileptic, Queen's-square, held at Freemasons' Tavern. His Royal Highness has accepted the invitation of the committee of Almack's to be present with his bride at a ball to be given in celebration of their wedding on June 12, at Kensington House.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

ITALY.

Tuesday being the birthday of King Humbert, all the European Sovereigns and the heads of foreign Cabinets telegraphed their congratulations to his Majesty on the occasion. Rome was gaily decked with flags, and a review of the troops was held by the King in presence of Queen Margherita and the Prince of Naples. On returning to the Quirinal, in front of which large crowds were assembled, their Majesties and the young Prince appeared on the balcony of the palace, in response to the repeated and prolonged cheering of the people. A great demonstration was organised in the evening in honour of his Majesty. Telegrams from the provinces show that similar enthusiasm was everywhere manifested.

Italy is mourning the death of two distinguished men. General Medici, the first aide-de-camp to the King, died on the morning of the 9th inst.; and Signor Lanza, who was Premier when Rome became the capital of the new kingdom, in the afternoon of the same day. In the Chamber Signor Lanza was referred to in eulogistic terms by the Vice-President and other members. It was agreed that the President's bench should be draped in black for a fortnight in honour of the deceased. The remains of General Medici were buried on Saturday at Rome with an imposing demonstration of national grief; and on Sunday, with equal tokens of sorrow, though without the military accompaniments of the former ceremonial, the body of Signor Lanza was taken from the hotel where he died to the railway station for removal to Casale, his native place.

GERMANY.

At a funeral service in Berlin, in memory of the late Alexander II. of Russia, not only the Emperor William, but the Crown Prince and other Princes, were present. His Majesty, it is stated, cordially saluted the Russian Ambassador on his arrival and departure.

The Lower House of the Prussian Diet has passed the second reading of the bill for the purchase by the State of several private railways, including the Bergisch-Markische, Thuringian, and Rhine-Nahe Railways, all the proposals of the committee being adopted.

The committee of the Prussian Economic Council have passed the Tobacco Monopoly Bill, with some modifications.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

The Hungarian Premier was received at Vienna on Sunday morning by his Majesty in a long audience, and at noon a Cabinet Council was held in the Foreign Office under the presidency of Count Kalnoky, in which the Common Ministers of War and Finance, the Austrian Premier and Minister of Finance, the Hungarian Premier and the Hungarian Minister attached to the person of his Majesty took part. On Monday, at noon, another Ministerial Conference was held in the Foreign Office; and in the afternoon there was a Cabinet Council, at which his Majesty presided. It was decided that, in view of the members of the Hungarian Diet having to come up to Vienna, it would be most convenient to have the meetings of the Delegations during the Easter recess, which will, therefore, be somewhat longer this year.

The Austrian Lower House of the Reichsrath has authorised the issue of a Five per Cent Paper Rente, to cover the Budget deficit and the extraordinary credit required for the operations in Herzegovina.

In last Saturday's sitting of the Lower House of the Hungarian Diet the Budget Bill was adopted by a large majority. The Lower House has approved the Petroleum Tax Bill, and proceeded to discuss it, clause by clause.

The Croatian Diet was reopened on Tuesday at Agram. A Royal Rescript was read inviting the Diet to choose certain members who, with the members deputed by the Hungarian Diet and the town and territory of Fiume, should finally determine the Fiume question.

RUSSIA.

Many high Russian officials went to Gatschina last Saturday to congratulate the Emperor on his birthday. St. Petersburg was gaily decorated in sign of rejoicing. It is stated that within the last few days eight hundred persons who had not been furnished with passports have been expelled from Moscow.

Monday being the anniversary of the death of the Emperor Alexander II., a solemn funeral service was held in the Cathedral of St. Peter and St. Paul, St. Petersburg.

TURKEY.

The Russian Ambassador in Constantinople has presented to the Porte a written declaration on the subject of the war indemnity, making a formal claim to such revenues of the Turkish Empire as were not hypothecated previous to the Berlin Congress.

A Greek journal in Constantinople having written against the Patriarch, 600 Greeks attacked the office of the paper, burning all the copies they found. Six persons were injured.

GREECE.

The King and Queen have returned to Athens. His Majesty is in a better state of health.

The Chamber of Deputies having elected the Opposition candidates for the posts of vice-presidents and secretaries, M. Comoudouros has resigned, and M. Tricoupis has been intrusted with the formation of a new Ministry.

AMERICA.

President Arthur has appointed Mr. Samuel Blatchford, of New York, to the post of Associate Justice of the Supreme Court. Mr. John Russell Young has been nominated United States Minister to China.

The Senate has passed, by twenty-nine to fifteen, the Chinese Exclusion Bill. The bill, which goes to the House, provides that from ninety days after its passage until the expiration of twenty years the coming of Chinese labourers to the United States shall be suspended. It exempts from exclusion Chinese merchants, teachers, students, travellers, and diplomatic agents, also labourers who were here when the last treaty was ratified. The bill also prohibits the admission of Chinese to American citizenship.

The House has passed a resolution instructing the Secretary of State to ask for information in respect to the imprisonment in Ireland of Daniel M'Sweeney.

The Committee of Ways and Means has proposed a bill reducing the inland taxes on spirits, malt liquors, tobacco, and cigars, also abolishing sundry stamps, which, if passed, will make the aggregate annual reduction in the revenue about 65,000,000 dols.

Sergeant Mason, who attempted to shoot Guiteau during the trial at Washington, has been found guilty and sentenced to eight years' hard labour, and to be dismissed with dishonour from the service. A petition for his pardon is being extensively signed.

The attractions of the Old World for the natives of the New are certainly not diminishing. Last year it was said that a greater number of Americans visited Europe on pleasure than ever before, and with the early spring of 1882 a still greater rush seems to have set in. Three hundred tourists left New York last Saturday, and the agents of the ocean steamers report that the applications for cabin passages are double in number those registered at this time last year.

CANADA.

The Quebec Legislature met on the 8th inst. and elected Mr. Taillon as Speaker. The Hon. T. Robitaille, the Lieutenant-Governor, in opening the Legislature, alluded in fitting terms to the attempt on the life of Queen Victoria. He said, "We take advantage of the occasion of the re-opening of the Legislature to tender to the Queen an expression of our affection, loyalty, and gratitude for the many benefits she has conferred upon this country."

The Hon. W. Wedderburn, the Provincial Secretary of New Brunswick, has presented his Budget for 1882-3. He estimates the revenue of the province at 599,620 dols., and the expenditure at 597,296.

The Legislature of Prince Edward Island was opened on the 8th inst.

SOUTH AFRICA.

Sir Henry Bulwer has dissolved the Legislative Council in Natal, on instructions from home, in order to give the colonists the opportunity of expressing their views on responsible government by fresh elections.

The revenue receipts of the Cape Colony for the half-year ended Dec. 31, 1881, compared with the corresponding period of 1880, show an increase in general revenue receipts of £202,307; in railway receipts, of £131,322; and telegraph receipts, of £8834; being a total increase of £342,465.

An extraordinary Session of the Volksraad of the Orange Free State was opened on the 8th inst. On the following day it was resolved to refuse to allow President Brand to accept the Grand Cross of the Order of St. Michael and St. George, offered him by the British Government for services rendered in connection with the settlement of the Transvaal difficulty. On Tuesday last, however, President Brand addressed the Volksraad, and announced that he had determined to accept the distinction. A long discussion on the subject ensued, and a resolution was finally adopted by a majority of six votes granting the President the necessary permission.

A telegram from Durban states that on the 21st ult. a Boer force with a native contingent and three guns, which had attacked the chief Mousiva, was repulsed with heavy loss, and that on the 25th it fell into an ambush and retreated, after losing thirty-eight men, including the commander.

Ayoub Khan has left Meshed for Teheran, under arrangements made with the Persian Government.

The death is announced of the "Seigneur of Sark," the Rev. W. T. Collings, M.A., which took place at Guernsey, in the sixty-first year of his age.

It is stated that the Chinese are beginning to construct twenty forts to the south of the Usuri River, and are fortifying the frontier of the Sandchaku territory next to Russia.

The proposal to build a new house for the Governor-General of India at Simla when resident there has been finally sanctioned. Public offices will also be constructed.

Several persons have perished by an earthquake which has occurred in Costa Rica. There was great exaggeration in the first report, which stated that many thousands had been killed.

A handsome volume has been issued by the New South Wales Government, entitled "Official Record of the Sydney International Exhibition, 1879." A geological map showing the mineral wealth of New South Wales is appended to the work.

Tuesday's Gazette announces that letters patent have been issued under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom for the annexation to the Island of Jamaica of the islands known as the Morant Cays and the Pedro Cays, of which islands possession was taken on behalf of her Majesty in 1862 and 1863.

Mr. Des Vœux, Governor of Fiji, has sent to his Legislative Council a message explaining the financial position of that colony. It appears that great efforts have been made to reduce the expenditure; but that, nevertheless, after the exercise of the most rigid economy, the estimated expenditure for the year 1882 amounts to £108,980, against an estimated revenue of only £106,805. Mr. Des Vœux makes the gratifying announcement that, notwithstanding the want of police and efficient prisons, crime of nearly all the graver kinds is almost absent. The decrease of the native population has been arrested, and there is now an excess of births over deaths.

The shrinking of the waters of Lake Constance, owing to the extraordinary dryness of the winter, has brought to light some lacustrine relics near Steckborn, in canton Thurgau. There are bone and flint implements, harpoons, pottery, many specimens of which are intact, clubs, baskets, arrows, field tools, and animal remains. Among the latter are skeletons and part skeletons of the bear, bison, and the moorhen. The find also includes a considerable quantity of oats and wheat in a good state of preservation, and a remarkably perfect and artistically executed stag-horn harpoon. The relics have all been removed to Frauenfeld and added to the collection of the local historical and natural history society.

A set of memorial tablets, bearing the names of all the officers of the Bombay Army who died in the late Afghan war, is to be placed in St. John's Church, Colaba, Bombay. The church was itself built as a memorial of the first Afghan wars, and contains a similar monument of all the officers and men who then died. Special memorials are also in course of erection in the church in memory of some of the deceased; but funds, it is stated, are still needed for the general memorial. The expense of the tablets will be on an average £5 for each of the names. Subscriptions will be received by the Afghan War Memorial Fund, Bombay Army, Hong-Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, 31, Lombard-street.

BUENOS AIRES.

The opening of the South American Exhibition at Buenos Aires, on the 15th ult., under the direction of the Argentine Industrial Club and with the patronage of the Argentine Republican Government, is an event of considerable interest. The Argentine Republic, comprising the territories on the right bank of the La Plata, and west of Uruguay and Paraguay, with an extensive region southward, is next in size to the Empire of Brazil. Buenos Aires, with its capital, the important commercial city of that name, is the leading member of the Federation, which includes fourteen provinces—namely,

Buenos Aires, Entre Rios, Santa Fé, Corrientes, Jujuy, Salta, Tucuman, Catamarca, Santiago del Estero, Rioja, Cordova, San Juan, Mendoza, and San Luis. The metropolitan province of Buenos Aires is situated on the south-western shore of that great inlet of the Atlantic called the Rio de la Plata, while most of the other provinces above named are in the great interior plain northward which is traversed by the Parana and its western tributaries, navigable for a distance of 1300 miles. The entire population now approaches two millions, and is of a more unmixed European character than that of other countries in South America, the Spanish settlers having been reinforced by Italian, French, German, Swiss, and English immigrants, and not having amalgamated so much with native Indian races as in some of the Spanish colonies. Buenos Aires, or "Good Air," as the place is called from the salubrity of its atmosphere, enjoying a temperate climate in nearly the same latitude as our Cape Colony, New South Wales, and New Zealand, is a handsome city, a hundred and fifty miles from the open sea, but conveniently situated for maritime traffic. It was founded three hundred years ago by Don Juan de Garay, and now contains nearly 300,000 inhabitants, with a very large and increasing trade, the value of yearly exports having reached nine millions sterling. There are several lines of railway connecting this port with the interior provinces. The seat of the National Argentine Government is here, with the official mansion of the President, General Roca, and the Palace of the Federal Congress; the province has also its own Governor, Ministers, and Legislative Assembly. In the Plaza de la Victoria, which is the subject of one of our illustrations, stand the Cabildo, or Supreme Court of Justice, distinguished by its clock-tower, the Municipal Townhall, the Cathedral, and the Monument of Liberty, in the form of an obelisk surmounted by a statue. The memory of Argentine struggles for political independence, which have cost more than one protracted civil war, is cherished with much patriotic sentiment. The bronze equestrian statue of General Joseph San Martino, who died an exile at Boulogne in 1850, after rendering great services to his country, stands in the Champ de Mars, north of the city. Another illustration shows the Government House of the Argentine Republic, called the Casa Rosada from its roseate pink colour, in which the Federal President and Ministers reside; the fine new building adjacent is the National Post Office. The Custom House is also represented among these views, and the highly ornate Chapel of St. Felicitas, in the suburb of Barracas. The Exhibition Palace, a structure of the same character as those erected upon similar occasions in Europe and in the British Colonies, stands in the Calle Ecuador, with one side along the Calle de la Piedad, the other along the Rivadavia, and has been designed by the engineer, Señor Pablo Blot, so as to afford the most ample and convenient accommodation.

The three Portraits which we publish are those of the Governor of Buenos Aires and his two Ministers. The Governor, Dr. Dardo Rocha, is a distinguished lawyer and orator, who for more than twenty years has taken an active part in the politics of his country, discharging the duties of a representative of Buenos Aires successively in the Provincial Chamber, in the National Congress, and in the Argentine Senate, being also at one time President of the last-named body. It may be said that during the last ten years no question of importance has been resolved upon without his being consulted.

The Minister of the Interior, Dr. Carlos d'Amico, is also an eminent lawyer and journalist, having been for some time editor of El Nacional, an important daily paper of Buenos Aires. He was Secretary to the Senate during more than ten years.

The Minister of Finance, Don Francisco Urburu, a gentleman well versed in all matters relating to finance, has been member of the Argentine Congress and Senator in the State of Buenos Aires; and has become noted for his valuable reports as a member of the Budget Committee.

THE TRIAL FOR POISONING.

In the Central Criminal Court at the Old Bailey, before Mr. Justice Hawkins, on Tuesday, the trial of George Henry Lamson, surgeon, for murdering by poison his young brother-in-law, Percy Malcolm John, ended with a verdict of guilty and sentence of death. It began on Wednesday week, and occupied five days. The Solicitor-General, Sir Farrer Herschell, with Mr. Poland and Mr. A. L. Smith, appeared for the prosecution on the part of the Crown; and the prisoner was defended by Mr. Montagu Williams, Mr. C. Mathews, Mr. E. Gladstone, and Mr. W. S. Robson. Several of the Aldermen of the city of London and the Sheriffs occasionally sat with the Judge on the Bench. We give an illustration of the scene in court. The prisoner, George Henry Lamson, is twenty-nine years of age, the son of a clergyman, and was a surgeon by profession, residing a year or two of late at Bournemouth and Ventnor. In the autumn of 1878, he married Miss Kate John, one of several brothers and sisters, whose parents were dead, and who had inherited a small property to be divided among them. The youngest brother, Percy Malcolm John, was a cripple, afflicted with curvature of the spine and paralysis of the lower limbs. He would have been nineteen years of age on Dec. 18, but his death before the age of twenty-one would be a gain of £1500 to his sister's husband, Lamson, who was in a desperately embarrassed pecuniary condition. The boy was a pupil at the private boarding-school of Mr. W. H. Bedbrook, Blenheim House, Wimbledon. Here Lamson came to visit him; and on Dec. 3, while in easy conversation with Mr. Bedbrook and the unfortunate youth, produced some capsules for taking medicine, but into which he pretended only to put sugar. He persuaded the lad to swallow one, and immediately left the house. Percy Malcolm John was taken ill a few minutes afterwards, and died in three or four hours, having been poisoned by a dose of aconitine. It was proved that Lamson had recently made purchases of that deadly ingredient. At the end of his trial, the jury were in deliberation three-quarters of an hour. The prisoner, on being asked the usual question after the verdict, protested his innocence, and Mr. Justice Hawkins then passed the sentence of death, which he received calmly. He was removed on Tuesday evening to Wandsworth Prison, where the sentence is to be carried out. The foreman of the jury handed in a paper suggesting that greater restrictions should be placed upon the sale of poisons; and the Judge said that their opinion should be forwarded to the Home Secretary. Among the figures sketched by our Artist in Court during the trial are those of the Judge, the twelve jurymen, and Mr. Alderman Cotton, who sat beside Mr. Justice Hawkins; the prisoner Lamson, and his counsel, Mr. Montagu Williams; and four of the principal witnesses—namely, Mr. Bedbrook, Mrs. Bowles, matron of the boarding-school, Mr. Watt, the classical assistant master, and Dr. O. W. Berry, of Wimbledon, who attended the poor youth in his brief fatal illness. Dr. T. Boud, of Westminster Hospital, who made a post-mortem examination of the body, considered that the death was caused by poison, and the evidence of Dr. T. Stevenson, who with Dr. Dupré analysed the viscera and contents of the stomach, tended to show that aconitine had been taken by the deceased.

A handsome new Townhall, which has been erected in Spa-road, Bournemouth, was opened on Wednesday afternoon by a public ceremony, at which the vestrymen and chief parochial officers assisted.

At a crowded meeting of the Balloon Society yesterday week, Colonel Brine and Mr. Simmonds gave an account of their late attempt to cross the Channel. Both of the aeronauts announced their readiness to try another trip, and expressed the opinion that the Channel could be easily crossed in a balloon. Who doubts it? They were awarded medals.

Last month the officers appointed by the Court of the Fishmongers' Company seized at and near Billingsgate Market and on board boats lying off that place over 21 tons of fish as unfit for human food. Of this, more than 17 tons came by land. The fish included 3 barrels of gurnets, 34 of oysters, and 6 of pickled salmon; 17 bags of scallops, 28 of periwinkles, and 1 of whelks; 22 boxes of cod, 67 of haddocks, two of pickled herrings; 121 of plaice, 7 of whitebait, and 56 of whiting; 8 baskets of shrimps, 2 of skate, and 58 of smelts; 24 lobsters, 7 salmon, and 12 pairs of soles. The shell-fish alone weighed over 6 tons. It was all destroyed.

ART NOTES.

The exhibition of the Society of Painter Etchers in the rooms of the Fine Art Society, New Bond-street, is open; as also is that of the Society of Lady Artists, at their galleries, Great Marlborough-street.

The twenty-ninth annual exhibition of Pictures by Artists of the Continental Schools at the French Gallery, Pall-mall, will open next Monday.

Mr. Robert Dunthorne, Vigo-street, has published two large and superb etchings of Chartres Cathedral, by A. H. Haig. The execution of these works is highly artistic and the result entirely satisfactory. The grouping of the figures and the broad effect of light and shade are beyond all praise.

"Etchings of Celebrated Shorthorns," by A. M. Williams, is a work that will commend itself, not only to those noblemen and gentlemen who are interested in the breeding of cattle, but to the artist and connoisseur in etching. The animals are drawn and etched with a freedom and artistic feeling not always found in cattle portraits. The work is published by Mr. J. Thornton, Princes-street, Hanover-square.

The Prince of Wales, as president of the City and Guilds of London Technical Institute, presided on Monday afternoon at the annual meeting, which was held in the hall of the Mercers' Company, Cheapside. The Lord Chancellor, in moving the adoption of the report, dwelt upon the satisfactory progress which had been made during the past year, and remarked that from its success a good augury might be drawn for the future. He subsequently moved a vote of thanks to the Prince of Wales, who, in acknowledging the resolution, said that he hoped the rest of the City Companies would come forward, as eight had already done, to support the institution. He trusted that ere long we should see branches of these colleges formed to promote technical instruction all over the country. He should always assist those useful institutions to the utmost of his power. It was stated that the City Companies and the Corporation have contributed to the college an aggregate of £23,000 a year; that the total cost of the building for the Central Institute has been subscribed; but that money for fittings and apparatus is still wanted.

An exhibition of pictures and distribution of prizes was held on Monday evening in the Townhall, Chester, in aid of the funds of the Chester School of Art Society. The pictures were chiefly works by students, past and present, of the school. The prizes were distributed by Countess Grosvenor. The Duke of Westminster addressed the meeting.

Mr. T. Sidney Cooper, R.A., at a meeting held at Canterbury on Tuesday—the Dean presiding—expressed his intention of presenting to the city, in the course of a few days, the gallery of art he founded some ten or twelve years ago, in which he has ever since given gratuitous instruction to students. A condition made by the donor is that only a nominal fee shall be charged to the artisan classes for tuition, the original object for which the gallery was built having been the teaching of drawing to poor boys. The meeting determined to convert the gallery into a school, and to affiliate it to the Science and Art Department at South Kensington. Mr. Cooper announced that he had stipulated in his will that the last work on which he should be engaged at the time of his decease, together with his palette and brush, should be brought to the gallery and kept there.

Earl Spencer distributed the prizes to the students of the National Art Training School at Kensington on Wednesday.

A meeting was held yesterday week at the Mansion House on behalf of the South London Free Library, Art Exhibition, and Working Men's College. The movement for establishing them was warmly supported by the Lord Mayor and several other speakers, and resolutions were passed in favour of Free Libraries and Fine Art Exhibitions in South London.

The portrait of the Mayor of Newcastle (Alderman Angus), which has been painted by Mr. Wells, R.A., has been presented to the borough, in commemoration of the active part taken by him in the Stephenson Centenary on June 9, 1811.

The sale of the Hamilton Palace collection of pictures and various objects of ornamental art is, we understand, to begin with the Dutch and Flemish pictures, and a selection from the decorative furniture and other works of art, which will be arranged in the large rooms of Messrs. Christie the week previous to Saturday, June 17.

It has been decided by the Royal Institute of British Architects, subject to her Majesty's approval, to present the gold medal for the year 1882 to Baron von Terstel, of Vienna. Among the subjects for medals and other prizes to be competed for next session is one for the best design for an academy of music. A sum of £50 and the Soane medallion will be awarded in this instance.

A deputation representing forty principal towns in Great Britain waited upon Earl Spencer last week to ask that additional facilities should be provided for the lending to the provinces of works of art, and reproductions thereof, from the national museums situated in London. The Lord President and Mr. Mundella stated what had been already done in this matter, and assured the deputation that they had the fullest desire to do all they could to meet their wishes.

The annual introductory address was delivered on Monday evening, at the rooms of the Medical Society of London, by the president, Mr. Francis Mason, F.R.C.S., Surgeon to St. Thomas's Hospital. There was a large attendance of Fellows and their friends. In his address, Mr. Mason gave his experience of the society for the last twenty years, and, in showing that it had never been in a more flourishing condition than now, he referred to the fact that it was the oldest medical society in London, having been instituted in 1773.

Lord Kimberley on Tuesday received a deputation from the British and Colonial Union, which urged the Government to modify the present duties levied upon the wines of the Cape and Australasian colonies. The Colonial Secretary replied that if the wine duties were to be revised, he should be very happy to lay the subject before the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as it was purely a fiscal matter. This question had not been overlooked, inasmuch as the Agents-General in South Africa and New South Wales had brought the subject under the notice of the Government, and it would receive consideration.

Last week 2740 births and 1793 deaths were registered in London. Allowing for increase of population, the births were 100 below, whereas the deaths exceeded by 2, the average numbers in the corresponding week of the last ten years. The deaths included 19 from smallpox, 34 from measles, 28 from scarlet fever, 15 from diphtheria, 175 from whooping-cough, 15 from enteric fever, 2 from ill-defined forms of continued fever, 14 from diarrhoea and dysentery, and not one either from typhus or simple cholera; thus, 303 deaths were referred to these diseases, being 84 above the corrected average number in the corresponding week of the last ten years. The deaths referred to diseases of the respiratory organs, which had in the four preceding weeks steadily declined from 994 to 470, were last week, 473, being 14 below the corrected weekly average.

GENERAL HOME NEWS.

This year's conference of the Social Science Association, in Nottingham, will begin on Sept. 20.

It is officially notified that the State apartments of Windsor Castle will be open to the public on and after Monday next.

Mr. Edward Cooper Willis, of the Inner Temple, has been appointed one of her Majesty's Counsel learned in the law.

Mr. Geoffrey Browning has been appointed Solicitor to the Irish Land Commissioners, in place of Mr. Fottrell, resigned.

The great clock of St. Paul's has been stopped to make preparations for raising the great bell which is to be fixed in the south-west tower.

Mr. W. A. Blount, Norroy King-at-Arms, has been promoted to the office of Clarenceux King-at-Arms, vacant by the death of Mr. Robert Laurie.

Mr. Arthur Ackermann, of Regent-street, has sent a selection of Prang's choice Easter Cards, of which he is the sole importer. They include two effective Turner-esque views.

Mr. William Martin Coates, L.S.A., of Salisbury, and Mr. Alexander Harkin, M.D., King's College, Aberdeen, of Belfast, have been elected Fellows of the Royal College of Surgeons of England.

The Lord Mayor gave a dinner last Saturday to a number of gentlemen who had taken interest in the Smoke Abatement Exhibition. Among the company were the American Minister, Earl Delawarr, Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, Sir H. Vivian, Sir F. Leighton, Sir F. Pollock, and Mr. G. A. Sala.

As Mr. Fordham-Flower points out that ladies and gentlemen go to the Zoological Society's Gardens to take a last long-lingering farewell of Jumbo, without a thought of their own carriage-horses waiting for hours in pain from tight bearing-reins, and envying their humbler brethren, the cab-horses, standing in blissful freedom from the infliction.

Sir H. Brougham Loch, K.C.B., on Tuesday informed the Manx Legislature of his intention to resign the Lieutenant Governorship of the island, and warm eulogium was passed upon the services of his Excellency on behalf of the island. The Queen has appointed Sir H. Loch one of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, in place of Mr. Howard, deceased.

The Emperor of Germany has forwarded, through the Foreign Office, presents to the masters and certain of the seamen of the Aberdeen steamers Banchoy and Ballochbure, the former for saving the lives of the crew, and the latter for towing into harbour the abandoned vessel Alwine Durg during a storm in the Baltic in July of last year.

The St. Pancras guardians have considered the architect's plans for the erection of a workhouse on the site of that now existing, together with additional buildings, if deemed necessary. After considerable discussion, Messrs. Wilson, Son, and Aldwinckle have been elected as the architects for the new workhouse, and their estimate is £78,000.

The London Chamber of Commerce has addressed a circular to the Chambers of Commerce in France urging them to call upon the French Government to conclude a commercial treaty with this country by allowing the duties on which no understanding could be arrived at to remain as fixed in 1860 and 1864.

Professor Huxley has published the results of his investigation of the salmon disease. He finds the fungus to be the cause of the mischief, though it is probable that it attacks fish in some way predisposed. It grows freely on dead flies and objects of that kind, so that there can never be any lack of media of infection.

A lady calling herself "Lady Agnes M'Lean," said to be a lady of title by birth, and widow of the late Count de Montmorency, died suddenly in the St. Pancras Workhouse on the 1st inst. At the inquest held yesterday week a sad story of her want and suffering, and finally mental aberration, was told. Apoplexy was said to be the cause of death.

The opening of the Falstaff Club on Tuesday night was made the occasion of a brilliant display of its hospitable capacity. Soon after the hour announced for the soirée musicale the club was filled by celebrities—musical, dramatic, social, and literary, foreign and native. The Duke of Edinburgh occupied a box, and remained while Mr. Brandram recited an address, written by Mr. George Augustus Sala.

Princess Mary (Duchess of Teck) and the Duke of Teck visited the exhibition of camellias in the Royal Botanic Society's Gardens on Tuesday. The exhibition, which has been open during the week, will close this (Saturday) evening.—The ordinary monthly meeting of the Fellows of the Royal Horticultural Society took place on Tuesday at South Kensington, for awarding certificates for spring flowers.

The Victoria Cross has been conferred upon Lieutenant Alan Richard Hill, who under a heavy fire endeavoured to carry Lieutenant Baillie out of the action at Laing's Nek, and after the latter had been shot dead brought out two wounded men; upon Private John Doogan, 1st Dragoon Guards, who rode in among the Boers to save Major Brownlow; upon Lance-Corporal James Murray, of the Connaught Rangers; and upon Private James Osborne, of the Northamptonshire Regiment, for similar acts of bravery in the Transvaal.

At a meeting at Plymouth yesterday week the proposed re-erection of Eddystone Lighthouse on the Hoe was practically determined upon. It was reported that about £1000 had been already promised towards the cost of the work. Mr. Gower, the owner of the American yacht Silver Spray, being in Plymouth Harbour, and hearing of the plan to rebuild Eddystone Lighthouse there, has sent £50 towards the fund for this purpose, saying that he believes many Americans would like to be represented in the fund for preserving the structure.

A paper on "Three Months' Journey Inland from Mozambique" was read on Monday to the Royal Geographical Society by Mr. Freshfield, in the absence of the writer, Mr. H. E. O'Neil. The country traversed by the traveller in a journey of over five hundred miles had never before been explored by Europeans, although in the possession of the Portuguese for more than a century. Beyond the level land of the coast the country becomes mountainous and rocky, with small rivers nearly dry except in the rainy season, and is sparsely inhabited until the country of the Makua is reached. Here the traveller was compelled by failure of supplies and the existence of a tribal war to turn back, having penetrated about two hundred miles from the coast, and to within about nine days' journey from Lake Nyassa. He was within sight of the great Namuli Peak in the Inagu Hills, but, to his great disappointment, found himself unable to ascend it. The road he followed he considered the best route to the lake but for the perpetual tribal wars that render it insecure. On his return he attempted to reach the coast by a more northerly road, but was again compelled to abandon his intention by the same causes that barred his advance. The country, although in parts thickly peopled, offered no trade prospects, the only profitable commerce being in slaves. After some remarks from Mr. Joseph Thomson and the chairman, it was announced that on the 27th inst. Dr. O'Donovan will read a paper on his journey to Merv.

THE INSURRECTION IN HERZEGOVINA: SKIRMISH WITH AN AUSTRIAN OUTPOST.

THE HERZEGOVINA INSURRECTION.

The Austrian Government has been obliged to employ military forces to the amount of 76,000 men, a fifth part of the whole Imperial army, to put down the insurrection in Herzegovina and Bosnia, and to prevent it from spreading to Dalmatia. Recent accounts describe the hardships and sufferings of the Austrian troops during the last two winter months as really terrible. A correspondent says that at the first post he visited the men said to him, in reply to his inquiries how they were faring:—"We have never been out of our uniforms since Dec. 10." The bleak and elevated mountain regions in which the advanced posts of the Austrian forces are planted are altogether without trees, and destitute of any kind of fuel. It is rare, indeed, for the troops in those exposed spots to be cheered with the sight of a fire. In order to obtain fuel it is necessary to make regular foraging expeditions into the narrow valleys, or rather gullies, at the foot of the mountains; but even there it is rare to find anything but stunted trees and brambles. The scantiness of fuel and the rarity of the luxury of a fire are the more felt as the "Bora," or icy north wind, seldom ceases to blow. Another difficulty is to obtain water. This generally has to be fetched from cisterns or reservoirs situated at a distance; and, as is the case with the wood, it is never safe to send soldiers singly for it. The carriers have to be protected by a guard in advance, and in the rear to prevent them being surprised and cut off by the lurking bands of insurgents. It is no wonder that in spite of the excellent food supplied to the troops, large numbers of them are on the sick list. They are laid up in hospital with fever and colds, lameness, and exhaustion. Probably at this moment the battalions sent to the south have on the sick list more than half as many men as all the insurgents under arms. The Austrian military operations, however, with some arduous marching and fighting last week, climbing lofty mountains and wading through deep snow, have been generally attended with success. The pacification of Crivoscie itself is declared to be almost complete; the positions gained have been fortified, and the transport of building material and provisions from the coast into the interior is proceeding without opposition. The Emperor has received General Jovanovics, the Austrian Commander-in-Chief, and thanked him for the manner in which he has conducted these operations.

THE JEANNETTE RELIEF EXPEDITION IN SIBERIA.

Our Special Artist, Mr. A. Larsen, who accompanies Mr. Jackson, Special Commissioner of the New York Herald, in his express journey across Siberia to find and relieve the shipwrecked crew of the Jeannette, Arctic exploring vessel, near the mouths of the Lena, has sent us letters and sketches. Having at least five thousand miles to travel in Northern Asia, for the most part by sledges and post-carts, he cannot be expected to accomplish the journey before April. From Tiumen, the first Russian town of importance in West Siberia, two or three days' travelling from Ekaterineburg and the Ural, but soon to be connected with Europe by railway, there is steam-boat conveyance, in summer, to the rivers Irtysh and Obi, and to the towns of Tobolsk, Omsk, and Tomsk; beyond which, still further eastward, lie Krasnoyarsk, on the Yenisei, Irkutsk, near Lake Baikal, and, to the remote north-east, Yakutsk, on the Upper Lena. These towns and provinces of Siberia are connected by post-roads, kept in good order and supplied with relays of horses or ponies for the traveller's use; and, in the season when the rivers are frozen, as they were at the time of our Special Artist's journey, the sledge or the tarantass, drawn by three horses, must carry him on from Tiumen to the east. The navigation opens about the middle of April, and closes towards the end of September. Tiumen is a town of 16,000 inhabitants, on the Tura, which flows by the Tobol into the Irtysh and Obi; here are thriving manufactures of iron, earthenware, glass, cloth, carpets, and leather; but the houses are mostly built of wood, and the town has a mean and dreary aspect. It is the great dépôt for Russian convicts sent as prisoners to undergo sentences of transportation in Siberia; they are dispatched hence by crowded barge-loads down the river, but have afterwards to trudge long distances on foot. The wandering tribes of Kirghis Tartars, from the vast steppe which extends south-east to the Altai mountains, are still met with in this province of Tobolsk. Our Artist's Sketches represent some of these people loitering before their tents of black hair felt, and some engaged in a festive bridal party. They are a scanty remnant of the once powerful and terrible nation of fierce Asiatic warriors, who conquered half the Old World under Genghis Khan and his successors, and who long held dominion in Russia, where many of them now find employment as porters and grooms. These Tartars are mostly of the Mohammedan religion, but a few tribes remain mere Pagans; their whole number in Western Siberia is reckoned at only forty thousand.

THE NAGA HILLS.

The Naga Hills are a wide tract of country on the north-east Indian frontier, between our tea-producing districts of Assam and the northern part of Burmah, embracing territory about two hundred miles from east to west, and one hundred and fifty from north to south. The inhabitants are the wildest and most turbulent tribes adjacent to any part of our Indian dominions, and for years past have menaced the safety of the tea properties of Assam. Small expeditions have been repeatedly dispatched to these hills; and in 1866 a permanent military post was established. In 1878 we advanced into the centre of the Naga country, and established our headquarters at Kohima. The Nagas resented our interference, and in October, 1879, the Political Agent and most of his escort were killed, while the remainder of the garrison of the Naga Hills were shut up in Kohima. This led to a brigade of troops being dispatched to the Naga Hills; and in the winter of 1878-9 a very unsatisfactory campaign was carried on, in which we lost many valuable lives of officers and men, and a considerable sum of money was expended. In March, 1879, a peace was patched-up, and the Nagas resumed the cultivation of their fields, while our troops retained their position at Kohima, as a garrison in an enemy's country, and a large military transport had to be kept up to supply them with food. Such is their present condition; but we are daily gaining influence over our conquered subjects, and the authority of the Political Agent is steadily increasing in the country. The Nagas, however, have a decided objection to be ruled over; and five of our political officers have lost their lives in the execution of their duty during the last six years. There is no road to Kohima; the path lies through dense jungle, and is, at certain seasons, almost deadly both to Europeans and natives, by reason of the miasma arising from the Nambhur Forest. The clearances in this vast jungle are twenty miles apart; and the distance has to be traversed on elephant-back, or on horseback, at the slowest walking pace. The distance of Kohima from the Golaghat road is 108 miles; but his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, Sir Donald Stewart, G.C.B., managed to arrive at the headquarters of the Naga Hills in six days. This official visit was of the utmost importance, otherwise it would not have been undertaken at a dangerous season of the year. The Commander-in-Chief, while marching up and down, was surrounded by a large escort, as it was quite possible he might have been attacked; the only dangers encountered, however, were the deadly swamps of the Nambhur Forest. The Naga Hills question will probably occupy the attention of the Government early next year. His Excellency was accompanied by the Quartermaster-General, General Sir Charles Macgregor, K.C.B.; the Adjutant-General, General Sir George Greaves, K.C.M.G., C.B.; and the Military Secretary, Colonel Chapman, C.B. After an inspection of the garrison, questions connected with the administration of this territory were discussed with the Political Agent. The Commander-in-Chief, after a visit of a few days, left for Calcutta on Nov. 9.

We are indebted to Captain St. John Michell, of the Intelligence Department, on special duty to Assam, for the Sketches we have engraved.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE ELECTRIC EXHIBITION.

We continue publishing the series of Illustrations of this brilliant and very instructive collection of the different kinds of apparatus and effects of applied electricity. Having described and exemplified, a fortnight since, various forms of electric light production, we now present some of the old and new varieties of electric telegraph, with the method of telegraphic writing, and that more recent invention, the distant speaking machine, or telephone.

The Postal Telegraph Department of her Majesty's Government has supplied to this exhibition a very complete historical series of examples, as well as the most advanced modern types of apparatus. Some of the following particulars are given us by Mr. Isaac Probert, of the General Post Office:—

The name of Sir Francis Ronalds will continue to be remembered from the fact that, so early as 1816, he demonstrated by actual experiment the possibility of an electric telegraph, and showed that electricity could be practically used for conveying messages over long distances. The house at Hammersmith, where the experimental line was erected, and where the original experiments took place, is the first large house at the east end of the Upper Mall. Our Illustration shows the form of Ronalds' Electric Telegraph, in which two dials (separated by a wire) were rotated synchronously by clockwork. When a letter which it was desired to transmit appeared at the opening in the dial at the sending end, a charge of statical electricity from a Leyden jar was sent into the wire, which caused two pith balls at both the sending and receiving ends to diverge simultaneously, and thus to indicate the letter. Words were thus spelt out. Sir Francis Ronalds used copper wire insulated in glass tubes protected by a trough of wood well tarred. The accompanying Illustration shows a portion of the original telegraph line laid down by Ronalds in 1816.

The first underground practical telegraph laid between Euston and Camden Town by Cooke and Wheatstone in 1837 has been nicknamed the Fossil Telegraph. It was formed of copper wires covered with cotton and pitch, and laid in grooves in lengths of wood of a triangular section, the grooves being fitted up by strips of the same material. The wood so prepared was buried underground.

The diamond-shaped five-needle telegraph instrument was the first kind introduced by Cooke and Wheatstone for public demonstration. We may here quote from the Society of Telegraphic Engineers' Journal:—"Late in the evening of June 25, 1837, in a dingy room near the booking-office at Euston-square, by the light of a flaring dip candle, which only illuminated the surrounding darkness, sat the inventor Wheatstone, with a beating pulse and a heart full of hope. In another small room at the Camden Town station, where the wires terminated, sat Mr. W. Fothergill Cooke, his co-patentee, and, among others, two witnesses well known to fame, Mr. Charles Fox and Mr. Stephenson. These gentlemen listened to the first word spelt by that trembling tongue of steel, which will only cease to discourse with the extinction of man himself. Mr. Cooke, in his turn, touched the keys and returned the answer. 'Never did I feel such a tumultuous sensation before,' said the Professor, 'as when, all alone in the still room, I heard the needles click; and, as I spelt the words, felt all the magnitude of the invention, now proved to be practical beyond cavil or dispute.'"

This instrument required five wires to work it; and a piece of the original wood, with the wires let into grooves on its triangular faces, is represented by one of the figures engraved. Mr. Fothergill Cooke, indeed, "has earned for himself the title to claim the honour of being entitled to stand alone as the gentleman to whom this country is indebted for having practically introduced and carried out the electric telegraph as a useful undertaking."

Our readers will easily perceive the great improvements made in telegraphy by comparing the following illustration with the preceding. We refer to that of Wheatstone's automatic apparatus, by which telegrams can be transmitted at a rate varying from 10 to 300 words a minute. Fig. 8 is the perforator for preparing the Morse signs, by a punched stamping, on a paper band. Fig. 9 is the transmitter, which signals the characters to the distant office under the control of the perforated slip. The receiving instrument, not shown, writes the corresponding signals in ink upon a green ribbon of paper. Fig. 10 is a specimen of the perforated band displaying three letters; and Fig. 11 is a copy of the characters produced by the receiving instrument, after passing the punched slip through the transmitter. The perforator, Fig. 8, is operated by striking the discs with iron punching-sticks, provided with indiarubber pads. Much labour is, however, saved by placing the perforator in a frame connected with the pneumatic system employed at the General Post Office (see Fig. 12); on touching one or other of three keys with the fingers, pistons are caused by air pressure to depress the corresponding disc. When the same intelligence has to be forwarded to three or four places, and the instruments communicating therewith apart, then it is possible to prepare, by aid of the pneumatic arrangement, three or four punched slips at once. Moreover, ladies can, without using much energy, manipulate the keys, whereas the punching-sticks would be to them irksome and trying. The centre disc supplies the small holes in the middle of the perforated band; the left-hand disc, when forced down, causes two of the larger size holes to appear one immediately above the other, while a blow on the right-hand disc furnishes the two holes at an angle. To render this clearly, the same letters are shown underneath, in the Morse character, as copied on green paper by the receiving instrument.

Lightning Protectors serve to protect the fine wire used in the receiving instruments from fusion, or other injury, by leading the impetuous electrical currents, set up in the exposed wires during thunderstorms, away to the ground. Numerous forms are exhibited by the Government, which are shown among our Illustrations, 13 to 19.

Our readers may see at a glance the wonderful growth of the Telephone, from its first introduction by Professor Bell in 1877, of which we published Engravings in our issue of Dec. 15 of that year. From the time of its first appearance, and subsequently, from the invention of the microphone, all the efforts of science have been directed to increase the volume of sound. In this direction the Gower-Bell telephone leaves little to be desired. The loudness is produced by means of a reed, which vibrates in front of the iron plate; the telephone is of a circular form, and from its centre projects a speaking-tube, with mouthpiece. Blowing into the tube sets the reed vibrating, and the sound is repeated loudly enough at the receiving end to be heard in the room. The magnet, as will be seen, is semi-circular in form. The other transmitter, the Pantophone of M. de Locht Labye, is a very sensitive instrument; it will transmit speech at a distance of two or three yards, when speaking in an ordinary tone of voice, and when shouting to it, at a much greater distance. The Pantophone is to be seen in operation at the southern end of the eastern gallery of the Crystal Palace.

In consequence of the very serious railway accidents which have lately occurred, great interest is shown by visitors to the Crystal Palace in some of the systems of electric signalling there exhibited. In the eastern gallery is a working model of an automatic block system, which is the invention of Mr. King of Paixton, Derbyshire. The model is exhibited by the Electric Railway Signal Company, of Stone Cross, Mansfield, Nottinghamshire. In this system, signal-posts are placed along a line of railway; and a train passing the first puts the signal, by mechanical means, at "danger," simultaneously signalling forward by electricity to any distant station. On passing the next post it puts this signal at "danger," at the same time, by electricity, putting the signal at the post it has previously passed at "line clear." A contrivance of clockwork is also shown, by which a train, in passing a signal-box, forces the minute-hand of a clock back to zero. The hand then travels on again, till forced back by a following train; and if there should be no train for fifteen minutes the hand indicates the length of time elapsed, up to a quarter of an hour; so that the engine-driver has a sure guide as to the period of time since the passing of the last train. There is another arrangement (but which is not exhibited in the model in the Crystal Palace) that indicates the number of trains which have passed the signal-box in which the clock-work would be placed, as well as the exact time at which each train passed. At junctions the signals are connected with the points which, when opened, show "danger" to the driver coming on the main line and "clear" on to the branch, and remain so until the points are closed. Mr. King's patent can be readily adapted as an auxiliary to any system of hand signalling. To all appearance, this system is as perfect for clear-weather signalling as can be wished, although the first cost of adopting it would be very considerable. But its weakest point is with regard to the dangers existing in foggy weather. In the north nave of the Crystal Palace there is an apparatus exhibited by the British and Irish Telephone and Electric Works Company, which is designed to overcome the difficulties consequent on foggy weather, and which is very ingenious, but also very simple.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

Messrs. Chappell and Co. have recently published some piano-forte music of a light and pleasing character, suitable for drawing-room performance. Among the most attractive pieces may be mentioned: "Moment Musical" and "Valse Brillante," and a charming "Gavotte," by Jules Janotha—performed in public by Mlle. Janotha—"Caroletta, a Little Dance," by Paul Duprê; "Irlandaise," and "Grottesque," by Bond Andrews. From the same firm we have several songs of interest. "Wake in all thy Beauty," by F. H. Cowen, is likely to become a favourite. "In Alto Mare" and "Languirò Sempre," by P. M. Costa, are graceful compositions; "The Two Marys," by A. Whitley, is lively and pretty; "The Jovial Beggar," by Mrs. A. Goodeve, is a characteristic setting; "In the Twilight of our Love," by Arthur Sullivan; and "Our Farewell," by Lady Arthur Hill, will find admirers; as will also "I pass'd beside a Lonely Wood," old English ballad, with symphony and accompaniments by G. A. Macfarren; and "Soft, soft Wind," and "Shepherdess' Song," by Alice Borton.

Of several vocal compositions lately issued by Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co., the most interesting are "Unchanged," by Alicia F. Scott; "Strew on her Roses," song for soprano or tenor; and "The Cottage by the Sea," for baritone or contralto, by Hastings Crossley; a cantata, entitled "Caractacus," of a spirited character, by J. F. H. Reud; a fresh and tuneful cantata, called "Minster Bells," by Franz Abt;—and, among the "Orpheus, New Series," charming part-songs by the last-named composer, H. Hofmann, and others.

"Little Photos," by J. H. Wallis, published by R. Cocks and Co., will be found useful for young performers, being fingered, and the passages facile and melodious. "Classics for Young Pianists," edited by F. Lemoine (from the same publishers) will encourage a taste for standard works, and a wish for further acquaintance with them.

Messrs. W. Morley and Co. furnish welcome contributions in the form of songs by Ciro Pinsuti, "The Good Old Times," and "Liberty Hall;" also "Love's Letter-Box," by Michael Watson, and "Forgive Me and Forget," by O. Barri.

Two songs, by Mrs. Power O'Donoghue, "Where Art Thou?" and "Last Year," published by Boosey and Co., are flowing and expressive.

From Messrs. Stanley Lucas, Weber, and Co., we have a supply of new and attractive vocal pieces, foremost among which may be mentioned "Ich Fühle Deinen Odem," by M. V. White; "The Better World," for voice and piano, with violin obbligato (and harmonium ad libitum), by Michael Bergson; and "She and I," by Rozelle.

Some transcriptions for piano, by E. Aguilar, from Bach's violin sonatas, published by Messrs. Duff and Stewart, will be found useful in the school-room, being carefully fingered.

"A Winter Story," by Michael Watson, possesses pathos. This song is published in various keys, to suit voices of different compass, and has an accompaniment, ad lib., for harmonium or organ. "The Angel's Home," song by E. Harradan, is quiet and touching in character. "Twilight Shadows," by J. Clippingdale, is of a pensive cast, and will please. All these songs are published by Messrs. Patey and Willis, as are likewise some pianoforte pieces of interest by F. Berger—viz., "La Galante," a Gavotte, and "The Mother's Prayer."

"Songs for Young Singers," by T. Crampton (published by B. Williams), is the title of a collection of eight pleasing ditties, all simple in style, but varied in character, and well calculated to interest the juvenile people for whom they are intended. The same publisher has recently brought out a very effective song, entitled "The Old and the Young Marie," composed by Mr. F. H. Cowen to words by F. E. Weatherly. The melody is taking, although lying within a limited compass of voice, and the accompaniment is also easy. Another pleasing song is "Love Abides," composed by J. L. Roeckel, issued by the same publisher; as is "Cul-loden," a Jacobite song by G. H. L. Edwards, a well-marked melody, with a distinctive touch of Scottish character. "The Emigrant's Promise," is a pathetic setting, by H. J. Stark, of sentimental words by J. G. Watts. There is much genuine sentiment both in text and music. This is also published by Mr. Williams, as are three spirited dance pieces for the pianoforte—"Booted and Spurred," galop, by C. A. Gleig; "Little Maudie," polka, by F. W. Weierner; and "Bon Marché," polka, by O. Seydel.

Trade is said to be suspended at the Gold Coast owing to disturbances among the native tribes in the interior.

KING'S ELECTRIC SIGNAL FOR RAILWAYS.

THE QUEEN AND HER PEOPLE.

Her Majesty, who left England for Mentone on Tuesday, has written an affectionate letter to her subjects, thanking them for "the outburst of enthusiastic loyalty" which lately followed on the dastardly attempt of the miscreant Maclean. The letter, published in a special supplement of the London Gazette, is addressed to Sir William Harcourt, Secretary of State for the Home Department, and is a most remarkable and touching missive. It runs thus:—

Windsor Castle, March 12, 1882.

The Queen wishes, before she leaves England for a short while for some comparative rest and quiet, to express from her heart how very deeply touched she is by the outburst of enthusiastic loyalty, affection, and devotion which the painful event of the 2nd instant has called forth from all classes, and from all parts of her vast Empire, as well as by the universal sympathy evinced by the Sovereigns and people of other nations. The Queen cannot sufficiently express how deeply gratified she is by these demonstrations, and would wish to convey to all, from the highest to the humblest, her warmest and most heartfelt thanks.

It has ever been her greatest object to do all she can for her subjects and to uphold the honour and glory of her dear country, as well as to promote the prosperity and happiness of those over whom she has reigned so long; and these efforts will be continued unceasingly to the last hour of her life. The Queen thanks God that He spared her beloved child, who is her constant and devoted companion, and those who were with her in the moment of danger as well as herself; and she prays that He will continue to protect her for her People's sake, as He has hitherto so visibly done.

THE DUDLEY GALLERY.

It is increasingly difficult to review, with any attempt to enter into detailed observations, the contents of the successive exhibitions at this gallery, especially those of the "General Exhibition of Water-Colour Drawings," the last of which is now open. Every year the numbers in the catalogue seem to increase—they now reach 642! Every year the works individually seem less important, whether as to scale or the amount of thought expended on them, yet every year they seem to attain in larger proportion to a uniform level of passable, though certainly not high technical merit. The practice of art in all its branches is evidently extending, and with it the facilities for acquiring mere mechanical proficiency; but we fail to see here any signs of higher aim than before or more thorough training. It is, however, precisely to this gallery, which probably contains a larger proportion of works by young artists than any other, that we should look for any encouraging indications of the progress of our school. Yet, after making all due allowance for the loss of successive contributors who, having made a mark here, are draughted off into one or other of the elder societies, we find the present display decidedly depressing. We remember few exhibitions in which there has been so little of distinctive merit or even novelty—so little to claim or reward careful critical examination. The want of knowledge of the "figure" and form generally; of fuller preliminary practice in "black and white" to master the secrets of effect and tone; of those principles, artistic and scientific, which must be put into operation in order to produce a picture, in contradistinction to a mere study or sketch, and of a more worthy conception of the function art than that of turning out only saleable furnishing "bits" within the reach of slender purses—is everywhere apparent. In short, we are driven to the conclusion that the numerous outlets afforded for immature, common-place, and insignificant work in exhibitions such as this (which have no counterpart on the Continent), are a snare instead of a legitimate resource for the young artist.

There was a rumour recently that the Dudley Gallery was not thriving, and would shortly terminate its independent existence. But the report was at least premature; and it could have had little foundation if the number of works the committee of this gallery can count on receiving is any measure of the support upon which they can rely. "The Dudley" may possibly amalgamate with the Institute of Painters in Water Colours, which is to have vastly increased accommodation in the large building now being erected nearly opposite the Royal Academy; but even this is not certain, seeing that in the catalogue of the present gathering the usual exhibition of cabinet pictures in oil is announced for next winter.

To attempt to offer a compte rendu of the multifarious items of the present show would be supererogatory, for reasons already given; nor would it be possible within our limits. Unimportant works by artists whom we may expect to find better represented elsewhere must be omitted altogether. The following, however, taking the order of the catalogue, approximately, possess some salient or novel interest. "A Golden Burden" (30), by G. F. Wetherbee, a girl bearing a sheaf of corn, under twilight effect, has good quality of tone. Analogous merit will be found in "Evening" (47), by Percy Tarrant. "Good-Night, Father!" (39), by Joseph Clark, is one of several versions in water colours of the artist's oil pictures; like the latter, they are sweet and homely in sentiment, but not more happy in colour. "Irises" (53), a flower-piece, by W. M. D. Mitchel, is treated with unusual breadth. "At Walberwick Ferry" (71), by Frank E. Cox, is bright and pleasant. "A Trout Stream" (72), by W. G. Addison, shows direct study of nature, but is a little crude—a fault not observable in other works by this artist. With these may be mentioned for their very similar merit the landscapes of Alfred Parsons. "Loch Dochart—Late Autumn" (85), by Henry Moore, reveals close observation in the representation of the snow on the higher hills, while the lower slopes, darkling under clouds and mist, are rendered with considerable power. "Just in Time" (98), by E. Waterlow, maintains the young artist's growing reputation, though we have seen better work from his hand. "The Marsh Mill" (103), with a sunset sky, by A. W. Weedon, is vigorous and telling. With a word of praise for J. Richardson's "Contentment" (113), we pause in some surprise before J. H. Henshall's "Aumeris" (122), a richly-attired Egyptian female figure (from Théophile Gautier's "Mommie," if we remember rightly), remarkable for character, unvulgar colour, and a finish of execution recalling that of Mr. J. D. Linton. "Boy Fishing" (134), by Mr. Stott, with other work by this artist, seems to show study in the French school in its breadth and grey tones. "On the Black Mount" (172), by W. H. Paton, is one of the most careful and complete works here. "Interior of a Turkish Bath" (181), with semi-nude bathers reposing, is a most daring piece of "blotterque" execution by no means without merit. "Ice on the Thames at Battersea" (186), by Arthur Severn, is commendable for choice of subject, but might have been rendered more impressive. "The White Sands of Iona" (188), by J. O. Long, is rather hard, but true to the wonderful colour of the locality. "Flowers" (196), by Maud Naftel, and "China Asters" (198), by Ada Bell, are both excellent in their way. "Lingering Light" (199), an effect of sunset on a hillside, by Joseph Knight, should be the best drawing here, occupying as it does the post of honour. It has the défaute de ses qualités in a conspicuous degree. The broad masses of shadow and light give it that impressive unity so rare in English work; yet this is attained only by heavy monotony of colour and mechanical repetition of form. "A Scene in Venice in the Seventeenth Century" (212), by V. Cabiancha, has the quality of style, also so rarely attained by our painters. Its massive breadth, intense shadows, and rich low-toned colour are highly effective. "The Shrine of St. Francis" (222), by Harry Goodwin, is a view, not without poetical feeling, of the memorable pile of buildings at Assisi seen from the valley below. "Jerusalem—Sunrise" (265), by H. A. Harper, is broadly treated and impressive; but we have never seen the buildings of the Holy City represented so tottery, irregular, and out of the perpendicular. H. Pilleau's view of "The two Colossi, Thebes—during the Inundation of the Nile" (268) is singularly delicate in colour and handling. No. 290, by E. Hume, and R. W. Radcliffe's "Wanderers from the Flock" (293) deserve notice; and still more so R. W. Allan's "Fish Stall at Venice" (310), in which the strong contrasts of sunshine and shade, with the piles of gleaming fish in the latter, are rendered with great force and truth. "Raising the Ghost" (303) and "Laying the Ghost" (321), farcical companion drawings, by A. Stocks, will find admirers. No. 335, by J. M'Dougal; 399, by Constance Phillott; 401, by Max Ludby; and 424, by R. W. Fraser, we have marked as noteworthy; as also J. A. Fitzgerald's fairy subject, called "Midnight Revellers" (481), in which we like best the skurrying rabbits. It is perhaps a pity, however, that so much labour should be expended on such a subject as this by an artist who can paint a figure so well as that of the negro servant trying on his master's lace neckerchief before a glass in the small drawing on one of the screens called "Conceit" (540).

A few other drawings on the screens may be mentioned. A group of bric-à-brac (510) by B. W. Spiers is painted with almost painfully minute equality of stippling: the finer qualities of art technique are not to be thus obtained. Mr. Ruskin sends a small study, apparently unfinished, "In the Pass of Killiecrankie" (511), in which the general effect is got with adequate breadth, if in rather unlovely hues (colour in touches, to render it "precious," was, we presume, to be added), yet with an attention to detail that shows keen observation of nature and conscientious care in the record of that observation. "Kittenhood" (560), two little girls with a kitten at a piano, by E. A. Hughes, is a gem; the children's faces are lovely, the colour is much richer than is usual with this artist, and free from the former excess of violet. "Bread and Sunshine" (609), a miniature on ivory by Mr. Herkomer, representing a young Tyrolean peasant sitting on a stout timber fence, discussing a loaf, in full sunshine, is a marvel of minute yet broad and forcible elaboration. The sciography—the incidence of the shadows on the objects upon which they are cast—seems so scientifically accurate that the use of photography is suggested. We do not affirm, however, that the camera has been employed—though we have no fear of an action for libel such as that lately brought in a Belgian court against a critic, and lost, by the painter, Van Beers. Who shall say that the aid of photography may not be legitimately employed to fix unerringly the changeable shadows of figures in sunlight?

ROYAL INSTITUTION LECTURES.

MECHANISM OF THE EYE.

Professor McKendrick began his eighth lecture on Tuesday, the 7th inst., with remarks and illustrations of the means by which we are enabled to accommodate our sight to the perception of objects, at a distance varying from five or six inches to about seventy yards (termed the near and distant points). This power was studied by Dr. Thomas Young, and is attributed to the change in the shape of the lens produced by means of delicate elastic muscular fibres, which adjust the focussing. The specific action of light upon the eye in the production of luminosity and colour was next considered, and it was stated that these results may be obtained by mechanical stimulants or electrical currents, or may be the consequence of disease, objective and subjective; and also positive and negative impressions were explained and illustrated, with other interesting ocular phenomena. The physiology of the retina was next considered and fully illustrated, reference being made to the entrance of the optic nerve, the yellow spot, the most important point, and the blind spot. The conditions of retinal excitation were stated to be as follows: luminous rays must have a certain wave-length from red to violet, and the excitant must act for a certain time and with a certain intensity. Illustrations were given of the phenomena due to persistence of images on the retina, and it was explained why light coloured and white bodies appear larger than dark ones; a fact due to irradiation. By this means, as well as by fatigue of the retina, erroneous impressions are sometimes produced. The lecture was closed by a series of brilliant experiments illustrating the production of colours in great variety, including the complementary colours and neutral tints.

GEOGRAPHICAL DISTRIBUTION OF ANIMALS.

Mr. P. L. Sclater, F.R.S., Secretary of the Zoological Society, gave his fourth and concluding lecture on Thursday, the 9th inst. Beginning with the fauna of Madagascar, or Lemuria, a sub-region of the Ethiopian region, he showed how it differs from that of the mainland of Africa by the absence of the larger quadrupeds, and by the presence of thirty species of lemur, which replace the monkeys. Madagascar is also specialised by the singular animal the aye-aye, very much resembling the rodents, and by many peculiar birds. The Oriental or Indian region was next considered. Its larger animals are somewhat inferior to those of Africa. They include the tiger, elephant, leopard, rhinoceros, tapir, and camel. The region is very rich in birds, especially in Gallinae, such as peacocks, pheasants, and other fowls. The fauna of the Palearctic region (North Asia, Europe, and Africa north of the Atlas), the next reviewed, was characterised by special types, such as the wild sheep and chamois, and a great variety of singing and other birds. The carnivora include bears, wolves, dogs, and many rodents, beavers, hares, &c. The sixth and last region reviewed was the Nearctic (North America, down to the Isthmus of Tehuantepec), which has a great general resemblance to the Palearctic region. The mammals, as a whole, are very similar—the glutton, beaver, sheep, and reindeer being instanced as forms common to both; but there are besides indigenous elements represented by the prong-buck (an antelope) and the intermixture of neotropical forms, such as the raccoon and the opossum. The special forms of birds include the bluebird, mocking-bird, and a few humming-birds; and the turkey specially belongs to America. Having now reviewed the six great regions and their types and "lipotypes," the lecturer concluded by discussing the most reasonable explanation of the phenomena of geographical distribution as thus manifested, and showed that the only hypothesis which gives any clue to their existence is that of the generic descent of species from other similar pre-existing species, or what is called "the Darwinian Origin of Species."

SWAN'S METHOD OF ELECTRIC LIGHTING BY INCANDESCENCE.

Mr. J. W. Swan, in his discourse at the evening meeting on Friday, the 10th inst., stated that the fate of electricity as a lighting agent, in place of coal gas, greatly depends on the success of the incandescent method. The older, or arc, system, by means of which the luminous points of two carbon pencils emit a powerful light, was exhibited and shown to be not adapted for private houses. After explaining that it is through the resistance afforded by platinum and other materials that a strong electric current is converted into luminous heat, he proceeded to demonstrate that such light could only be prolonged by surrounding it with a vacuum. He then showed how this can be effectually obtained by exhausting a glass bulb by means of the new mercurial air-pump. He stated that probably the first efficient incandescent lamp, with a carbon filament, was made in Newcastle, and exhibited at a meeting of the Philosophical Society in October, 1877. By burning a lamp under water containing fish he showed how small an amount of heat is evolved, and therefore that no injury can be done to a room or its decorations. The recently improved forms of this lamp can now be cheaply constructed and can be maintained at a high degree of incandescence for twelve hundred hours without succumbing. Comparing the cost with that of gas, and allowing for the value of by-products, one cwt. of coal distilled into gas will produce a light of 3000 candles for one hour. Now, one cwt. of coal will give 50-horse power for the same period. Reliable experiments have shown that by means of electric incandescence a light of 150 candles will be the product of one-horse power; so that one cwt. of coal, giving 50-horse power, affords by the medium of electricity a light of 7500 candles; whereas, if converted into gas, it would give only a 3000-candle light. As regards the cost of laying the electric wires, Mr. Swan quoted the authority of Sir William Thomson, showing that actual experience proved it to be less than the outlay incurred by the laying on of pipes for lighting by gas. Finally, he said that he had no doubts as to the future of incandescent electric lighting; and that, when once clearly established, it would be found cheaper than gas. All communities would welcome it for its marked advantages in connection with health and safety. The Lecture Theatre and Library were lit by Messrs. Faraday by Mr. Swan's method.

THE CHIEF PERSONS OF THE "ILIAD."—HOMER'S TRANSLATIONS.

Mr. W. Watkiss Lloyd gave his fourth and concluding lecture on Saturday last, the 11th inst. After a review of the subjects of the previous lectures, he considered the poet's conception of some of the leading characters. He discussed the various misinterpretations and misconceptions of a series of critics respecting the characters of Agamemnon and Achilles, and also the position of Helen with reference to her recent apologists, with whom Mr. Lloyd could not altogether agree, although they include such names as Pope, Mure, and Gladstone. He opposed to them the judgment of the poet himself, and contrasted her conduct and language with those of the virtuous Andromache. He quoted from her lament over Hector the lines,

For now, no other for me is in wide Troy remaining
Tender and kindly; but all, as they regard me, shudder.

Mr. Lloyd next considered the requisites of a translation of Homer for a purely English reader, referring first to the translations of Chapman and Pope. Both liberally interpolate in their renderings of the poet; but Pope shocks less frequently by incongruities, and recasts the style more completely, and preserves a noteworthy proportion of Homeric spirit in the most spirited passages. With all its faults, his Homer is a valuable acquisition for English literature. Literal prose and blank verse translations were described as inadequate for their purpose. Cowper's attempt is an admitted dreary failure; and, in spite of its popularity, Mr. Lloyd expressed his opinion that the late Lord Derby's version of the "Iliad" is no more than an improvement upon the pedestrian tameness of Cowper. He next pointed out the defects in the English couplet and in ten-syllable heroic line, blank or rhymed. Homeric rhythm and rapidity demand Homeric trochaic accentuation. In reference to the numerous unsuccessful attempts to naturalise the poet's own hexameter measure in English, Mr. Lloyd said that the Latins, in their adoption of Greek metres, took cognisance of the structure of their own language, which had not been done by English poets, and he pointed out the direction in which the solution of the problem is to be expected. After illustrating his opinions by quotations, he concluded by reading a specimen of a translation of both epics by himself, the passage chosen being the description of Achilles arming for battle, line for line, phrase for phrase with the original.

THE ATTITUDES OF ANIMALS IN MOTION.

Mr. Muybridge, of San Francisco, gave a lecture last Monday upon the science of animal mechanism as demonstrated by a series of experiments with electro-photography. He projected upon the screen, with the aid of the electric light, a large number of transparent photographs, illustrating the conventional attitudes in which the artists of various ages, from the earliest Egyptian to those of modern times, have represented animals to assume while executing certain movements; and compared them with the results obtained with twenty-four photographic cameras placed a short distance apart upon a bench laid parallel with a track over which the animal was caused to move, thus enabling him to obtain several pictures while it was making a single stride. Various successive attitudes assumed by the horse while hauling, walking, ambling, trotting, galloping, leaping, &c., were exhibited; and of dogs, oxen, deer, &c.; also of men walking, running, leaping, wrestling, turning summersaults, &c. Another series exhibited foreshortenings, obtained by the use of a number of cameras, with which simultaneous exposures were obtained of a moving animal from several points of view. With another instrument, called the zoopraxiscope, many of these photographs were exhibited apparently executing in sight of the audience movements as plainly as one sees an animal moving in nature. The Prince and Princess of Wales, the Duke of Edinburgh, and many persons eminent in literature, science, and art, were present.

Mr. W. Winterton, of Leicester, is gazetted High Sheriff of the county, in the room of Sir F. F. Turville; and Mr. H. Edwards, of Holyhead, High Sheriff of Anglesey, in the room of Sir C. Hoskyns Read.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, MARCH 25, 1882.

In the House Commons on Monday night the adjourned discussion on the first of the proposed new Rules of Procedure, or rather upon Mr. Marriott's amendment objecting to the closing of a debate by a bare majority, was resumed. It will be remembered that the suggested new Rules, twelve in number, were laid upon the table of the House soon after the Session opened, and that their consideration was deferred, first by the needless prolongation of the debate on the Address by the Irish members; next, in consequence of the action taken by the Government in the Lower House in respect to the appointment by the Lords of a Select Committee to inquire into the working of the Irish Land Act; and, lastly, by the urgent necessity of obtaining last week several votes in Supply before the close of the financial year. These hindrances having been removed, Monday was fixed upon for renewing the debate on the closure. In anticipation of that event, a meeting of about 150 members of the Conservative party was held on Friday afternoon, at which Sir Stafford Northcote recommended a determined but not an obstructive opposition to the First Rule, and expressed his opinion that, as there would be four clear nights for discussion, the division on Mr. Marriott's proposal might be taken before the Easter recess—which, by-the-way, is to commence on Tuesday, April 4, and to last six days. If that and other amendments should be rejected, the Opposition leader will himself move to negative the first resolution.

Such were the circumstances under which the debate was resumed on Monday night, after a multitude of questions (more than fifty), chiefly asked by Irish members on trivial subjects, had been disposed of. The first speaker was Mr. Raikes, a newly-elected member, and a former Chairman of Committees, whose official experience as a contribution to the discussion would have been more valuable if it had been less imbued with party spirit. But he effectively contrasted Mr. Gladstone's present opinions on the subject with those expressed by the Prime Minister when in opposition. The most noteworthy point in the powerful address of Lord Hartington, who followed Mr. Raikes, was his announcement that, without some change in the Rules, the Government could not make any approach towards carrying the measures which a great majority of the country required. If others thought they could carry on the business of the House under the existing rules, his Lordship declared that he and his colleagues would cheerfully make way for them; but as long as her Majesty's present advisers were responsible for the conduct of affairs they must appeal to the House to give them the powers necessary to that object. Lord Hartington hinted at some slight modifications of the First Rule later on—and probably the suggestion will bear fruit—but he insisted on the imperative importance of accepting the principle of the closure.

Sir John Lubbock, who subsequently spoke, did not object to that principle, but only to the mode of applying it. The hon. Baronet, as a Liberal, contends that in their proposed reform Ministers are going beyond the necessities of the case, and that if their scheme should be carried in its integrity, they would be forging an instrument of repression that may hereafter be turned against themselves. He therefore suggests, if he is not prepared hereafter to press, the adoption of a majority of two to one. This may sound very plausible; but its meaning is, in effect, that the Opposition shall control, or be enabled to defeat, the policy of the responsible Ministers of the Crown. That the Opposition are able from time to time to modify the measures of the Government by fair discussion every Session bears witness. Their indirect influence will always be potent. But is not Sir John Lubbock's proposal a scheme for sanctioning obstruction in a new form, and thus paralysing the hands of the Executive? In nearly every Legislature throughout the world the closure, in some form, is in operation. In England alone, where it has hitherto been unnecessary, is the Speaker's initiative suggested as a safeguard against the tyranny of the majority, and the notion that so exalted and responsible an official would declare "the evident sense of the House" to be in favour of closing a debate when a bare majority supported it, is, as Mr. Goschen has said, founded neither on reason nor experience. Parliament seems to have become so perverted by the obstructive action of Irish minorities, that it is thought to be monstrous for the Government, although representing a very large majority, to demand the power to carry its measures. Lord Hartington has put the matter with blunt plainness, and the Government are evidently of opinion that it would be better to consume the rest of the Session—for the Easter recess is already in sight—in carrying a proposal which would restore the suspended rights of the majority, than to accept any plan that would paralyse our Parliamentary system. It is certain that if every one of the proposed rules were to pass intact, the forms of the House would still favour prolonged discussion, and equally certain that public opinion would quickly condemn the slightest attempt to fetter freedom of speech.

During the absence of the Queen at Mentone, in which charming retreat her privacy is scrupulously respected, and her health and spirits are, we hope, being thoroughly renewed, her Majesty's sons, whose admirable training has well fitted them to sustain the prestige of Royalty, do not relax their efforts to promote on all suitable occasions those public objects which tend to increase the happiness or ameliorate the condition of her subjects. With the Prince of Wales at their head, the grand scheme of a Royal College of Music has been pushed forward by their Royal Highnesses with so much zeal and perseverance as to have passed out of the region of ideal projects. The inaugural assembly at St. James's Palace has been followed by a City meeting, at which the Duke of Connaught supplemented the preceding addresses of his three Royal brothers, and by a subsequent gathering of influential colonists at Marlborough House. It is stated that more than £50,000 have been already promised, and that an equal sum will probably be contributed by the City Companies and merchants. That one third of the required endowment should have been subscribed within a few weeks is a most auspicious beginning of this national enterprise, and a good omen as to the result of an appeal to the liberality of our provincial towns. As the Duke of Connaught said at the Mansion House on Monday, the object of the College is not to drain the country in general of musical genius in order to maintain a constant supply in London, but to create, as it were, "a reservoir, from which music may be circulated throughout the entire empire;" its functions as a teaching and examining body, by the aid of free scholarships, being intended to encourage musical talent wherever found. Thus, the College is to be developed into a national Conservatoire, to which all local schools may be affiliated; the whole system being put in action by a Musical Senate, which will appoint examiners and grant certificates. This gradual development of the scheme under the auspices of the four Princes, and Mr. Grove, the managing director, is adapted to win that public confidence which will ensure adequate pecuniary support.

It is amazing how practical improvements in "the houses we live in" lag behind the teachings and discoveries of sanitary science. Exhibitions, conferences, and societies for promoting the better drainage of our dwellings and improving the public health, seem almost a "delusion and a snare" in view of the startling revelations contained in Dr. Playfair's report on the sanitary condition of Bagshot Park, where poisonous sewer gases were permitted to permeate the mansion, and almost proved fatal to the amiable Duchess of Connaught and her infant daughter. In this new residence, constructed on the most improved principles, the elaborately constructed system of baths, drains, and waste-pipes actually communicated with the soil drains of the house, and conducted the poisonous malaria into the very heart of the building! Happily, her Royal Highness was, not without risk, removed in time from her unhealthy home, and is slowly recovering from an illness brought on by the same causes that nearly cut off in his prime the Prince of Wales. We seem to learn where the germs of death lurk in our houses only to become more exposed to their fatal influence. It is not merely the denizens in our back-slums, but the occupants of public offices, splendid mansions, and suburban residences, who are as liable as ever to be poisoned with sewer gas and carried off by typhoid fever, spite of pretentious builders and engineers.

The Channel Tunnel is making great progress, and at a meeting held a few days ago of the company that is responsible for the gigantic undertaking, Sir Edward Watkin, who was able to spare a short time from his personally-conducted tours to Shakspeare's Cliff, gave a most glowing report of their prospects, defended the project with his usual vigour, and expressed the utmost confidence that they would in due time meet their French friends midway beneath the "silver streak." Meanwhile the scientific committee is pursuing its inquiries, which are, however, limited to discovering whether the English end of the Channel Tunnel can be adequately protected against an invader. In the House of Lords on Monday night Lord Granville stated that the general national question involved would be open to the consideration of Parliament. If, however, as is understood, successive Governments have provisionally sanctioned the colossal work, does not the familiar proverb of the steed and stable-door find a new application? Sir Edward and his French colleagues press on, and on Tuesday obtained the prestige of a visit by the Prince and Princess of Wales. It seems to be rather a question of engineering enterprise than of legislative sanction; and, perhaps, when Parliament meets next year, its deliverance on the subject, whether favourable or otherwise, will be of no avail.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

Reasons, not of State, but of space, constrain me, this week, to merge the "Playhouses" in the "Echoes." There has been an exceptional pressure on our columns; and lest the "Playhouses" should be squeezed out altogether I was fain to entreat the daughter of Aer and Tellus to grant hospitality "on this occasion only" to Theopis and his train.

There is less need, perhaps, to apologise for bringing the drama to the front in this column, since the performance of "Romeo and Juliet" at the Lyceum is just now the universal topic of conversation in Society. "What do you think of Henry Irving's Romeo?" "How did you like Ellen Terry's Juliet?" are among the first questions asked you by the ladies whom you have the honour of taking down to dinner. Of course there are controversies as to the respective merits of these admirable artistes. There are Irvingites and Anti-Irvingites. There are Terryans and Kataterryans (I do not mean Kate). There are those who object to the resuscitation of the mute Rosaline, and others who object to the interior as well as the exterior of the tomb of all the Capulets being made the groundwork of a superb scene; and who think that Friar Laurence should be permitted to recite, after Juliet has slain herself, the inordinately long speech beginning with the delusive promise—"I will be brief."

But my business is to redeem the promise I made last week, and, leaving the magnificent impersonations of Mr. Irving and Miss Terry to the controversialists, to say something about the other performers in the tragedy. First let me give warm commendation to the Nurse of dear old Mrs. Stirling. Is it discourteous to call her old? Why, 'tis confessed in "Men of the Time" that the accomplished actress in question was born in 1817. Is it impertinent to call her dear? Why, she was one of my mother's dearest friends; and I remember full four-and-forty years ago seeing Mrs. Stirling, a young, beautiful, and vivacious woman, playing (in a full suit of brown velvet), at the St. James's Theatre, the part of the hero in a melodrama called "Pascal Bruno." Her vivacity has not left her; and age as well as youth has its beauty.

Mrs. Stirling's Nurse is, from first to last, a careful, appreciative, and scholarly performance. With exquisite skill does she portray that which seems to me the only tolerable feature in the Nurse's character, as Shakspeare has drawn it. She is a vain, fickle, cross-tempered, greedy, venal old woman; and her eagerness to persuade Juliet to commit bigamy by marrying Paris, on the plea that her first and lawful husband, Romeo, will never come back to Verona, is absolutely revolting. She is continually teasing Juliet; in one scene she wantonly tortures her susceptibilities; but she does really love the girl with that passionate and whole-hearted affection not uncommon in an age when fathers and mothers treated their children with inflexible severity, and the only kindness which the poor young creatures experienced was at the hands of dependents. Mrs. Stirling's expression of the Nurse's love for her foster-daughter made the Nurse herself (who otherwise would be but a Renaissance Mrs. Gamp) lovable.

Mr. W. Terriss is a very manly and gallant Mercutio, and suits the action to the word and the word to the action most eloquently as well as skilfully in the "Queen Mab" speech. Mr. C. Glenney is a picturesque and sufficiently fiery Tybalt. I mean that he is quite angry and animated enough, and does not rant, as too many Tybalts are apt to do. Mr. G. Alexander gives a modest but chivalrous rendering of the Count Paris; Mr. Fernandez delivers with due solemnity the lengthy sententia of Friar Laurence; and Mr. T. Mead is as concentrated, incisive, and striking in the Apothecary as I was sure this excellent Shakspearean actor would prove to be. Mr. Howe, as Capulet, is duly stately; but I must say with regret that I do not in any wise like Miss L. Payne's Lady Capulet. Her manner is as harsh as that of a mother in the sixteenth century generally was; but she might mingle some dignity with her harshness: and she is not dignified. Mr. Howard Russell speaks with intelligence and quiet effectiveness the prologue of the Chorus; and Miss Helen Mathews is a graceful Lady Montague.

Touching the scenery, dresses, and general "mounting" of "Romeo and Juliet" at the Lyceum, which I propose to notice next week (to do so now would be unjust to another theatre), there is but a solitary little morsel of sumptuary hypercriticism in which I intend to indulge; and it may as well be done with at once. The brown dress of Friar Laurence strikes me as being wholly incorrect. Friar Laurence was a Franciscan monk, and the Franciscans did not wear brown. The habits of the fraternity are figured, and the colours thereof described in Father Bonanni's great work "Ordinum Religiosorum in Ecclesia Militanti Catalogus," published during the Pontificate of Clement XI.; and in this book it appears that the Franciscans of the Observance wore a frock of "the natural colour of the wool;" that is to say, nearly white, and over that a short mantle with a cowl of the same material and hue. The Franciscans of the Stricter Observance, and those called Conventuals, were habited in grey, or ash-colour; and the monks were closely shaven, and wore only a very thin fringe of hair round their shaven crowns. At the Lyceum Friar Laurence is full-bearded.

Mr. H. J. Byron's Comedy-Farce of "Auntie," which has begun that which I hope will prove a long and triumphant career at Toole's Theatre, is an extremely funny production; in fact, you laugh so heartily and so continually during the three short acts of which the merry piece is composed, that you quite forget the fact that the plot of the play itself is of the very flimsiest kind. Nay, when even that circumstance is brought under your cognisance, the necessity of "Auntie" having any epopœa worth speaking of does not by any means become apparent. "We may be good and happy without socks," the philosopher has said; and "Auntie" gets on very well at Toole's Theatre with the very tiniest of dramatic socks and the most exiguous of buskins.

Mr. Benjamin Bunny (Mr. J. L. Toole) is the good-natured husband of a pretty young wife (Miss Winifred Emery). Mr. Bunny is, to use a Scotticism, "sair owerhanded," not by a "bubblyjock," but by his wife's aunt, Mrs. Dragoonier (Miss Emily Thorne), an imperious, selfish, and boastful widow, who rules the Bunny establishment with a rod of iron. On the other hand, the life of gallant half-pay Major-General Mogador (Mr. J. Billington) is made miserable by the continual presence and interference with his domestic affairs of his wife's brother, Charles Loafington (Mr. E. D. Ward). Miss Effie Liston plays Mrs. Mogador. The object of the two husbands is to get "Auntie" and the "loafing" brother-in-law out of their respective houses; and in this, after a series of very queer episodes overbrimming with broad fun, both in the action and the dialogue, they finally succeed. The story is materially helped in its evolution by the admirable acting of Mr. E. W. Garden as Snorum, a Margate lodging-house keeper, and of Mrs. Eliza Johnstone, as a strong-minded and deeply-injured cook.

A correspondent, writing from the Riviera with violet ink, all too pale for these dim eyes, has (unintentionally, I am sure) embittered my existence by referring to the adverb "helter-skelter." Says the correspondent from the Riviera:—

I find, on reading a small poem called the "Snow Bunting" (1876), the line "Not like the Dutch Fleet, helter-skelter of yore," and the following note appended. "No doubt an allusion to the defeat of the Dutch fleet, on the coast they were then traversing, when, after the death of Admiral Tromp, it fled, in the utmost confusion, part to the north towards the Helder, part to the south, towards the Scheldt (Dutch, Skelder), giving rise to the British sailor's exclamation, 'There they go, Helder-Skelder (helter-skelter).'"

And yet, adds my correspondent, "we meet with the word 'helter-skelter' in Shakspeare." Of course we do. It is in the Second Part of Henry the Fourth (act v. sc. 3), in which Pistol says:—

Sir John, I am thy Pistol and thy friend,
And helter-skelter have I rode to thee;
And tidings do I bring, and lucky joys,
And golden times and happy news of price.

Most of the dictionaries in my possession merely define "helter-skelter" as an onomatopoeic adverb formed to resemble the sound of the thing (as pell-mell, topsy-turvy, hodge-podge, humpty-dumpty), and signifying hurry and confusion, disorder and tumult, without regard to order and precedence. Very few of the lexicographers within my ken trouble themselves about the etymology of the word. One, indeed, Skinner, derives it from the Anglo-Saxon "heolstor accendo;" the hurry and confusion of the infernal regions.

The learned Professor W. W. Skeat, I have not the slightest doubt, knows all about the true derivation of "helter-skelter," and can cite numerous instances of the word having been used prior to Shakspeare's time. But I do not possess Professor Skeat's great work; and I cannot afford to buy all the dictionaries which are published. I have, indeed, an Anglo-Dutch "Woordenboek;" and therein the Batavian equivalent for helter-skelter is "rompstomp;" which does not help me much.

Mere conjecture is accounted by scientific philologists to be a very serious crime. I am not scientific; and, for the nonce, intend to be criminal. In the extremely unlikely case of there being no trace of "helter-skelter" to be found in English literature anterior to Shakspeare, how would it be if there were some truth after all in the "Helder-Skelder" story: only that it referred, not to the defeat of Tromp (whom my correspondent erroneously dubs "Van" Tromp), but to the scattering of the Spanish Armada? Let us be chronological for a moment.

According to the late Mr. Dyce, "The Works of William Shakspeare" (London: Bickers, 1881), the Second Part of "King Henry the Fourth" was composed prior to the year 1598. Now, the Spanish Armada was finally routed in September, 1588. I read in "Lingard's History of England" (vol. vi., p. 251):—

The dawn of morning discovered the Armada dispersed along the coast from Ostend to Calais. In a short time a cannonade in the direction of Gravelines collected the adverse fleets. The Spaniards, with forty sail, bravely sustained the attack of their enemy during the day; in the evening the increasing violence of the wind carried them among the shallows and sandbanks near the mouths of the Scheldt. The following morning, with the aid of a favourable breeze, they extricated themselves from danger.

"There they go, helter-skelter" (Helder-Skelder), one of the Elizabethan pilots may possibly have sung out. Probably he did not say or sing anything of the kind; and "helter-skelter" may be a word as old as Domesday Book. Still it may be humbly pleaded, in extenuation of my criminality, that war times are a peculiarly appropriate season for the coinage of new words. "Shave" for hoax first obtained currency during the Crimean War. So did "telegram" for telegraphic message. And to the American Civil War the Lingua Balatrónica owes the revival, if not the invention, of "skedaddle," "greenback," "copperhead," and "stampede."

I learn from excellent authority that the "Chaunt of Achilles," the sparkling pasquinade on the Rotten Row celebrities of the early days of the Victorian era, which appeared in the New Sporting Magazine in September, 1838, and the authorship of which has long and erroneously been attributed to Mr. Charles Sheridan, was, in reality, the offspring of the witty pen of the late Mr. Bernal Osborne. In a number of the magazine now in the possession of his son-in-law Mr. Osborne has, manu propria, signed the verses in question, and in the margin has filled out all the initials in the text. The fact is worth recording as an item in the social and literary history of our time.

Mem.: In a volume of The Kepsake for 1844, edited by the Countess of Blessington, and which I bought for the sake of its beautiful frontispiece—a portrait of Viscountess Jocelyn, engraved in stipple by W. H. Mole, after C. R. Leslie, R.A.—I find among the contributors Eugene Sue, the Hon. Grantley Berkeley, Benjamin D'Israeli (sic), M.P., Lord John Manners, Walter Savage Landor, R. Monckton Milnes, M.P., Richard Westmacott (of the Age?), S. C. Hall, and Ralph Bernal, M.P. Mr. D'Israeli's contribution is entitled "Fantasia." It is a prose romance—a three-volume novel compressed into two pages and a half. It begins "Sybically":—

'Tis a scene of perpetual moonlight; never-ceasing serenades; groups of gliding revellers; gardens, fountains, palaces!

It concludes "Tancredically":—

All is mystery; and so is Life. Whither do they go! and where do we! Yet it was a scene of perpetual moonlight &c., &c.—da capo.

Mr. Ralph Bernal's contribution is a romantic historic tale, called "The Rendezvous," the scene being laid in France at the period of the regency of Philippe of Orleans.

Touching the smoking of tobacco on the stage, "D. C.," Leeds, reminds me that the objectionable practice in question is not by any means a new one, and quotes Hartley Coleridge's "Introduction to the plays of Massinger and Ford" to show that in the Elizabethan and Jacobean eras the play-house stages were intruded upon by the young gallants of the Court, who, appalled in all their bravery, occupied stools where now would be the "wings" and puffed the fumes from their tobacco pipes in the faces of the performers.

But this was not precisely what I meant. That to which exception was taken was smoking by the actors themselves as part of the "business" of the play. Of course there has always been puffing of pipes in the inn parlour scenes in "Sho Stoops to Conquer" and "Paul Pry." Many years have passed since I last saw "No Song, no Supper"; but I think a pipe is smoked (I know that a real boiled leg of mutton is eaten) in that cheery English operetta. The earliest stage direction prescribing smoking that I can find is in Beaumont and Fletcher's "Rule a Wife and Have a Wife," in which (act iii. sc. 2) Perez is discovered "in a very mean lodging-house, seated and smoking." "Rule a Wife and Have a Wife" was in this manner performed at the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden, in September, 1825; but in Stockdale's edition of Beaumont and Fletcher, "printed from the text" with the notes of George Colman the Elder (London, 1811), there is no stage direction as to smoking. It was probably a traditional bit of stage "business." The earliest cigar that I can remember on the boards was the mild Havana smoked by the late Mr. Alfred Wigan in "Still Waters Run Deep." Then came Mr. Eccles's cutty pipe in "Caste;" and now cigars and cigarettes in actors' mouths (the ladies even have a whiff at a papillote, occasionally) have become universal and offensive.

The outcome of the lecture on the absurdities of modern feminine attire—an address which has been again delivered at the Kensington Townhall by the medical gentleman who labours under the hallucination that the votaries of fashion can be persuaded to obey the dictates of common sense—is an "Exhibition of Hygienic Costume" at the Cavendish Rooms, in Mortimer-street, which display opened on Tuesday and closes on Saturday. In a notice of the exhibition a writer in the Daily News makes, with amusing solemnity, the announcement "that on no pretence whatever would Man, were he artistic, philosophic, literary, or bucolic, be admitted." The writer goes on, "It is not thought seemly that men, because they happen to have the gift of drawing or writing, should be permitted to explore the mysteries of the toilette, and reveal the precise nature of those substructures on which the edifice of fashionable costume is reared."

This last paragraph strikes me as being the merest "fudge." It is notorious that the "fashions" are, in nine cases out of ten, devised by male and not by female artists. If you will keep your eyes open, you will see in nearly all the fancy stationers' shop-windows sheets upon sheets of woodcuts, representing with diverting naïveté the most intimate items of "the substructures of the edifice on which fashionable costume is reared." These pictures are drawn and engraved by men. The "patent seamless petticoat" was invented by a man—the Chevalier Something or another. The most noted dressmaker in the world is a man—Mr. Worth, of Paris. Men are known to be much more cunning cutters of ladies' mantles than women are; and, finally, it is to a gentleman—Mr. Samuel Sidney—to whose plain directions, in the "Book of the Horse," ladies who ride on horseback are indebted for information as to the "precise nature of the substructures" on which the edifice of female equestrian costume should be reared. Before Mr. Samuel Sidney's time, the vast majority of ladies seemed to think that a riding-habit, a man's hat, and a whip were the only requisites for an Amazonian costume; and their "substructures" were uncomfortable and dangerous.

There is nothing new under the sun. I have before me a book called "Health and Beauty," written about thirty years ago by an ingenious lady called Madame Caplin, and illustrated by a number of lithographs of ladies in various kinds of hygienic and non-hygienic corsets. Madame Caplin was a staymaker of the superior, moral, hygienic, and generally "high-toned" order; and she further to inculcate the maxim laid down by Spurrier that "health is the base and instruction the ornament of education," Madame opened, at her residence in Berners-street, an "Anatomical and Physiological Gallery for Ladies only." Berners-street is as close to Mortimer-street as Mantua is to Verona. The final cause of Madame Caplin's book and Madame Caplin's gallery was, of course, "high-toned" staymaking. What is to be the eventual result of the "Hygienic Exhibition" of 1882, it is difficult to foretell.

The Prince of Wales, accompanied by Princess Louise, paid a visit on Monday afternoon to the Victoria Hospital for Sick Children, in Queen's-road, Chelsea, and remained for a considerable time, narrowly inspecting the different wards of the institution. On Wednesday, the twenty-ninth instant, his Royal Highness takes the chair at a public dinner in aid of the funds of the hospital at Willis's Rooms. I shall have something to say concerning the festival and the admirable charity itself next week.

OUR ARTIST IN EGYPT: A THIRD-CLASS CARRIAGE ON THE RAILWAY BETWEEN ALEXANDRIA AND CAIRO.—SEE PAGE 200.

A JOURNEY ACROSS SIBERIA.

A telegram from Irkutsk, near the shore of Lake Baikal, in Eastern Siberia, dated the 11th inst., informed us last week that our Special Artist, Mr. A. Larsen, accompanying Mr. Jackson, Special Commissioner of the New York Herald, who is sent by the proprietor of that journal, Mr. J. Gordon Bennett, had safely reached that distant place, on their way to the River Lena. The aim of their long journey is to find and relieve the distressed Arctic exploring party shipwrecked in the Jeannette, Mr. Bennett's steam-yacht, which was equipped and dispatched from San Francisco to pass through Behring's Strait, and to explore the Arctic Ocean north of Asia.

The following extracts from our Special Artist's letters relate to the particular incidents which are delineated in his sketches engraved for this week's publication:—

"From Orenburg to the fortress of Petropaulovsk, there is no Government post for travellers. The horses are kept by the so-called 'voluntary' post. The price here is therefore much higher than in Siberia, the horses costing each four copecks per verst, whereas in Siberia the price varies from a copeck and a half to three copecks per horse. Nor are the stations kept by private enterprise so clean or so large as those on the Government post-road. In my sketch of the interior of one of these post-stations (No. 4) are two travellers drinking tea. To the left hand is the Russian stove, brick-built, and whitened with chalk. An open door to the next room shows a woman standing by the cradle with a baby. The cradle is fixed to the ceiling; the walls are covered with pictures of the Imperial family and others. As we travel day and night, the only sleep we can get is while driving on. But on tolerably smooth roads one soon gets accustomed to this. We put a few pillows on the seat, lie down stretched out at full length, well muffled up in furs, and so make ourselves as comfortable as possible (Sketch 3). A few days after our departure from Orenburg we reached the Ural Mountains. The snow had meanwhile become so deep, from the recent snowstorms, that we travelled with five or sometimes with six horses. In the Urals we were soon to experience the further effects of those snowdrifts (Russian "buran") which we had already seen in Orenburg and along the railway line from Samara to Orenburg. One night I was awakened by the howling storm, and, looking out, noticed that we did not move from the spot. The drivers, called "yemtschiks" in Russian, were beating and swearing at the horses; but it was of no use. The horses were standing in snow up to their bodies, perfectly exhausted. After a few more desperate efforts to move on, they lay down in the snow, as if to say they had done their utmost, and would die before they would do any more. The yemtschiks seemed to think the horses were right in this opinion. They came up to the sledge and told us that we could get no further; the snow was too deep. We were in a kind of valley, surrounded by high mountains. To the right and to the left were snow hills, which rose higher every moment. The wind was blowing with tremendous power, whirling the powdery snow high up in the air, making it almost impossible to keep our eyes open. The temperature was about twenty degrees of cold (Reaumur). So, what was to be done? Seeing that the horses were not able to pull, hardly even to stand upright, we told the yemtschiks to put them out of harness, and take them to the next station, from which they were to bring ten fresh horses. They did accordingly; after some minutes we saw them disappear, with the horses, in the dense mist. When we heard the last tinkling of their bells, it may be imagined how lonely we felt. We were left to ourselves there amongst the mountains, with no other company than that of the roaring wind, and the wolves howling at a distance. But the wolves soon came nearer; so near, that we saw them on the next snow hill about fifty yards off. (See my sketch of this incident.) We got out our weapons and had a few shots at the wolves, but it seemed without killing any one. Yet they were frightened by the shots, and disappeared, and did not come near us any more. During five hours we waited there; the sledge became more and more buried in snow, and we had got inside it to keep ourselves warm. At last, the bells were heard a second time, and then came the men with fresh horses, and wooden shovels to dig out the sledge, if necessary, or to clear the road of snow (Sketch 2). It appeared that our yemtschiks had lost the right road, and had consequently got into such deep snow that it was impossible to force a way through it. But all this while, only about twenty yards to the right of us was the high road, which we found after an hour and a half shovelling away the snow. The new horses did their work splendidly, such work as only a Siberian horse can stand; and after a few hours more we sat comfortably at the station, with a glass of tschai before us.

"Alongside the post road, in the steppe through which we travel, live many of the Kirghis. We had often seen them on the road, driving cattle to the next village, and had long wished to visit them in their winter dwellings. At the station Karakulskaja, twenty miles from Troitsk, we met a fine old Cossack named Ponomareff, who kept the post station. He was, as we afterwards learned, a rich man who owned a hundred horses, and the house where the station was established was his property. He gave us a very nice dinner, with a clean cloth, and even napkins to it, a great rarity among the Siberian peasants. In short, he tried, as well as his two sons, tall, fine-looking fellows, to make us as comfortable as they could. When we expressed a wish to visit the Kirghis, one of the young men offered to accompany us. Of course, we accepted his offer, with thanks; and presently started together. After an hour's drive we reached the Kirghis winter quarters, where the young Ponomareff explained, as the Kirghis did not speak Russian, that foreigners had come to see them. They were evidently much flattered, and invited us into their best hut. They ordered mutton to be prepared, with tea and other things, all which we, however, having little time, were obliged to refuse, not a little to the disappointment of our hosts. According to custom, we sat down on the divan; and while I was taking a sketch of the room, the Kirghis who took us round stood beside me, and watched the pencil. When the sketch was finished he roared with delight, and asked if I would not be kind enough to sketch the children in the school. Of course I wished no better, and we went there. When the door was opened we saw a little room four feet below the ground. On the floor sat five children, from four to six years of age, with huge Kirghis boots on their knees, reading half aloud. The reading was, to our ears, something like the humming of bees, but was accompanied by the bleating of some young kids, kept in the same room behind a straw lattice. This did not prevent the animals from coming out now and then, showing their heads between the children's, and looking on at the school. We were rather surprised at seeing such young children able to read, considering the fact that a great part of the Russian people in Europe learn neither to read nor write. We asked the schoolmaster, who sat by with his indispensable stick, to bid one of them read alone. Silence was then established, except the noise of the kids bleating, and every one of the pupils read a chapter of their prayer book, having previously found the portion he knew best. After having distributed about five pounds of honey cakes among the children, and having given a trilling money present to the older ones, which they would hardly accept, we thanked our hosts and young Ponomareff and continued our journey, much satisfied with this visit to the nomad Kirghis."

By the fall of a shed in the playground of a public school at Glasgow on Monday four children lost their lives and many others were seriously injured.

The Huddersfield Town Council have resolved to invest £50,000 in the Hull, Barnsley, and West Riding Railway Extension in the event of the bill for the scheme passing through the House of Commons.

A full meeting of the Victoria (Philosophical) Institute took place on Monday at 7, Adelphi-terrace. Fifteen English and foreign members having been elected, a paper on Climatic Influences as regards Organic Life was read by Dr. Gordon, C.B., Honorary Physician to the Queen.

The Citizen states that the total expenditure for general purposes at Christ's Hospital during the past year amounted to £57,354. Within the same period the average number of children maintained and educated in the Hertford and London establishments has been 1177.

Mr. G. W. Moore's annual benefit will take place at St. James's Great Hall, next Tuesday, in the afternoon and evening; when he will present two attractive programmes, sustained by the Moore and Burgess Minstrels and a galaxy of eminent artists connected with the principal theatres.

The annual benefit of the Royal General Theatrical Fund took place at Drury Lane Theatre on Monday afternoon, when the extensive miscellaneous programme customary on these occasions was presented to an audience which included a considerable proportion of the dramatic profession. Though many of the leading actors and actresses on the London stage had volunteered to appear in choice fragments from some of the most popular plays now being acted, and the potent name of Mr. Irving, who had undertaken to give a recitation, was included in the list, the attendance was, we regret to say, considerably thinner than on previous occasions. We gather from the programme that there are at present forty-nine annuitants on the books of this excellent institution, many of whom are over eighty years of age.

The two events of the past week in the Irish capital were the Castle Ball on St. Patrick's night and the Amateur performance at the Gaiety Theatre on Saturday, under the patronage of the Lord Lieutenant and Countess Cowper. The ball, notwithstanding the current reports that Lord Cowper shared the odium with which the present Ministry is regarded by a section of Irish society, was largely attended by the most influential landowners and their families; and the Amateurs attracted an overflowing audience, at double prices, in all parts of the house. The performance was in aid of the Drummond Institution, a charity founded by the late Alderman Drummond for the maintenance and education of the orphan daughters of soldiers. The pieces presented on the occasion were Mr. Byron's comedy, "Old Soldiers," and Mr. W. S. Gilbert's musical fairy tale, "Creatures of Impulse," and both were excellently acted. Mrs. G. M. Onslow and Mrs. G. H. Moore-Lane displayed histrionic talent much superior to the ordinary amateur standard, and Mrs. Langley's song in the second piece received, as it deserved, the honour of a double encore. Captain Moore-Lane, A.P.D., Captain McCalmont, A.D.C., Captain Somerset-Maxwell, Mr. Stopford, Coldstream Guards, A.D.C., and Messrs. Martin and Brien acquitted themselves admirably in the parts assigned to them. Mrs. Stephenson, the only professional lady engaged in the performance, acted with her usual intelligence and vivacity. Mr. Michael Doyle's admirable arrangements for the seating and exit of the vast audience contributed to the success of the entertainment, which, we are glad to note, resulted in a substantial addition to the funds of a most deserving charity.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

Paris, Tuesday, March 21.

No duels except in the provinces! No Ministerial crisis, in spite of the officious notes of the Journal des Débats! No murders to speak of! And yet the modest annalist must continue his weekly task. In his working-room Théophile Gautier used to have always before his eyes an ominous motto, eloquent in its pleonasm, "Les journaux quotidiens paraissent tous les jours!" With the necessary modification, the axiom is applicable to weekly journals. But why this hesitation? Why these doleful reflections? Indeed, the annalist may well lament and hesitate.

The calendar marks March 21; the weather is that of June 21. The sky is radiant, the buds are bursting, the apple-trees are in flower, the Magnolia Yulan of the Champs Elysees is in full bloom—a mass of celadon green like the floral decoration of a Chinese foukousa—the blackbirds are whistling, the crows are building their nests and noisily confabulating in President Grévy's garden; several members of the French Academy have renewed the cotton-wool in their venerable ears, and the sparrows have carried off the old wool to pad their nests withal; the Bois is resplendent with verdure and luxurious equipages; the country is inviting; Paris is full of the dazzling whiteness of Oriental sunlight . . . and the annalist must pursue his Sisyphean task, unmoved by the intoxicating perfumes of renaissance nature! For him Bank holidays have no charms; Easter brings no relief; he cannot even go to Paris and back for five pounds, seeing that he is already at Paris!

The Parisian waiters divide the English visitors to Paris into two categories, L'Anglais à primes and L'Anglais à primeurs. The former tightens his purse-strings and dines at fixed-price restaurants, where he avoids "suppléments" like poison, and takes modest stewed prunes for dessert; the latter is the rare representative of the gilt-edged "mildred" of the good old times who spends his money nobly and disdainfully. L'Anglais à primeurs, as his name indicates, feeds upon first-fruits, asparagus in January, strawberries in February, and green peas all the year round. Thanks to "personally conducted" tours, the Britishers of the stewed prune category are in the majority nowadays. They are already beginning to adorn the boulevards by their caricatured presence, their unpicturesque costume, and their astounding head-gear. What would the Londoners think of a Frenchman who promenaded Regent-street in greased boots, knickerbockers, and a grey cloth helmet-shaped hat?

But enough of personal reflections and dilettante observation. What is the news of the week? The Salvation Army has opened a campaign in Paris, and placed its head-quarters in the Rue Lafayette. Mr. and Mrs. Marwood have honoured the town with a visit and witnessed the rejoicings of the Mi-Carême. The worthy "exécuteur des hautes œuvres" was lucky, for, since the end of the Empire, such a brilliant Thursday of Mid-Lent has not been known in Paris. The boulevards were crowded beyond conception, and the masqueraders were more numerous and their costumes more brilliant than had been seen for many years.

For the present, the principal occupation of people of leisure, besides the duties and distractions of social life, is to lounge in picture exhibitions. Almost every week some new exhibition is opened by some club or another—a kind of dress rehearsal before the Salon. This year, however, the Salon, whose prestige has been greatly declining of late years, will be entirely eclipsed by an exhibition of a unique description, the idea of which is due to M. J. de Nittis. On May 1, on the same day as the Salon, there will be opened in the fine new galleries of the Rue de Sèze an international Salon, but a Salon composed only of the works of a few first-rate artists. England will be represented by J. E. Millais, Belgium by Alfred Stevens, Italy by J. de Nittis, Spain by Madrazzo, Holland by Josef Israëls, Germany by Adolf Menzel, Austria-Hungary by Munkacsy, and France by four painters—Meissonier, Jules Dupré, Gustave Moreau, and Paul Baudry. A more splendid list of names could not be desired; each nation will be represented by the artist who is beyond dispute the first of his time. Such an exhibition will, of course, offer an interest of the rarest order, and it will be organised in conditions the most favourable for showing the pictures and for the comfort of the visitors. In presence of the increasing favour of private and independent exhibitions, and, above all, in presence of the realisation of this idea of an international and independent exhibition, one is tempted to predict the near approach of the day when the Salon will be abolished for ever. Apropos of the foreign artists, I may mention that M. de Nittis is about to have an exhibition of his pastels in Maclean's gallery. As for the Meissonier exhibition, which was to have taken place in the gallery of the Rue de Sèze, it has been found impossible to arrange it, owing to the fact of many of the artist's finest works being in America, and owing to the enormous ad valorem duties that would have to be paid, a second time over, on the return of the pictures. Meissonier will therefore have a place amongst his illustrious international colleagues in art. Finally, to conclude my budget of art news, I may state that Mr. James Tissot was last week elected a member of the "Société d'Aquarellistes Français."

It is the custom for the gazettes to record the sayings and doings of Victor Hugo. At home one must do as the Romans. On Sunday there was a grand dinner at the poet's house, and during dessert the host was told that Alexander III. had pardoned five of the men who were condemned to death, and in whose favour Victor Hugo had written a letter of eloquent antitheses, published by the newspapers of Europe and America. Victor Hugo then rose, and, with profound emotion, proposed this toast:—"I drink to the Czar who has pardoned five of the men condemned to death, and who will pardon them all!"

MUSIC.

The last two Saturday afternoon concerts at the Crystal Palace each included a violin concerto. In the earlier instance, Madame Norman-Néruda played, with fine mechanism and style, the elaborate work that was completed by the late Henri Vieuxtemps but a few days before his death, in June last. The concerto is more successful as a vehicle for the display of executive skill than as a composition intrinsically. On Saturday last Herr Joachim gave a splendid performance of Brahms's First Violin Concerto, and was also heard in his unrivalled execution of two movements (prelude and fugue) from Bach's Sonata in G minor for violin alone. The concert opened with Herr Joachim's impressive "Elegiac Overture," which, as well as the concerto, has before been commented on by us. Other items of both the concerts referred to call for no specific remark beyond the facts that vocal pieces were successfully rendered, on the earlier occasion by Miss C. Elliott, and on the latter by Mrs. Hutchinson and Miss Hope Glenn. "Mignon" was announced to be given by the Carl Rosa Opera Company, in the Crystal Palace theatre, on Tuesday, and "The Bohemian Girl" on Thursday afternoon.

Madame Schumann played again at the Saturday afternoon popular concert of last week, when the eminent pianist gave Beethoven's "Moonlight" sonata with fine effect, and was associated with Madame Norman-Néruda in an excellent performance of Brahms's duet sonata for pianoforte and violin (op. 78). This was Madame Néruda's last appearance this season. At Monday evening's concert Herr Joachim was again the leading violinist, and Middle Krebs reappeared as solo pianist.

Mr. Sims Reeves gave the last of his series of concerts of operatic, national, and miscellaneous music at St. James's Hall on Tuesday evening, when he sang, with the usual effect, Handel's recitative "Deeper and deeper still," and air, "Wait her, angels;" and Beethoven's "Adelaide," the latter accompanied by Madame Arabella Goddard, who also gave a fine rendering of the same composer's Pianoforte Sonata in A flat, with the Funeral March. Madame Patey, Misses Clements and S. Jones, Mr. Herbert Reeves, and Mr. F. B. Foote contributed to a varied programme, which also included the skilful instrumental performances of the "Auenoic Union." Mr. Reeves will now resume his provincial tour; returning to London in May.

The Royal Albert Hall Choral Society gave a performance of Berlioz's "Faust" music—for the first time in the great Kensington building—on Wednesday evening; the solo music having been assigned to Madame Marie Roze, Mr. V. Kiby, Mr. King, and Mr. Pyatt.

The Philharmonic Society gave the fourth concert of the present season on Thursday evening, when the programme comprised Beethoven's C minor symphony, Mendelssohn's first pianoforte concerto, played by Madame Schumann—this being the fiftieth anniversary of its first performance here—and other interesting features.

The new patriotic song introduced at last week's Ballad Concert is a setting by Mr. C. V. Stanford of lines by the Poet Laureate (some verbal modifications having been made to suit the music). Mr. Stanford, we believe, has adapted a melody furnished by an amateur, and the result is a song of a bold and national character (with an effective choral refrain), the rhythmic effect of which was enhanced by Mr. Santley's fine declamation. The programme was otherwise also of an interesting, although not novel, nature; having comprised popular pieces contributed by the vocalist just named, Misses S. Jones, M. Davies, and McKenzie, Madame Sterling, Mr. E. Lloyd, Signor Foli, and the members of the South London Choral Association. This week's concert was the last evening performance of the series, an extra concert being announced for next Wednesday morning.

The Guildhall School of Music gave a choral concert at the Mansion House last Saturday afternoon, when the choir sang, with great effect, Mendelssohn's eight-part psalm, "Judge me, O God," and his motet, "Hear my prayer," and other choral pieces. Among these was a cleverly-written part-song, "It was a lover and his lass," composed by David Davies, a student; Miss F. Allitsen having produced a pleasing song, "Stars of the Summer Night," which was well rendered by Mr. D. Henderson. There was some solo playing by Master Leopold (violin) and Mr. Johnson (violin), the former displaying much promising aptitude. Mr. Weist Hill conducted, and Mr. Beardwell was the accompanist.

M.M. Carl Weber (pianist) and A. Kuumer (violinist) gave the first of four concerts of chamber music at the Royal Academy of Music on Wednesday evening; the programme on this occasion having comprised Gade's pianoforte trio, the second string trio of Beethoven, Schumann's "Fantasie-stücke," and vocal pieces contributed by Madame Fassett.

The Carl Rosa Opera Company's performances—removed from Her Majesty's Theatre to the Standard Theatre last Monday week—are to close this (Saturday) evening. Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" was announced for Wednesday.

The last of Mr. W. Macfarren's three orchestral concerts at St. James's Hall takes place this (Saturday) evening, when the programme will include Beethoven's violin concerto (played by Herr Joachim), Spohr's symphony, "Die Weihe der Töne" (known here as "The Power of Sound"), Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A minor, and other items.

The Highbury Philharmonic Society gave a very effective performance of the music of Weber's opera, "Euryanthe," on Monday evening, by a band and chorus of two hundred performers, the solo singers having been Misses F. Norman, C. Penna, and E. Gibson, Mr. Maas, Mr. Forington, Mr. Thornthwaite, and Mr. W. Thornthwaite. Dr. Bridge conducted. The English text used had been specially adapted by Mr. W. Thornthwaite. The occasion was one of much interest, the work being Weber's stage masterpiece and but little known to the English public. It is included in the repertoire of the German opera performances to be given at Drury Lane Theatre next May and June.

Dr. Sullivan's sacred drama, "The Martyr of Antioch," will be performed next Monday evening by the Brixton Choral Society, Mr. Lemare conducting.

A meeting in support of the Royal College of Music, recently advocated by the Prince of Wales at St. James's Palace, was held on Monday at the Mansion House, under the presidency of the Lord Mayor. The Duke of Connaught pointed out that the college would supply two great educational wants, and that its promoters desired to create an institution which was to be a reservoir from which music might circulate throughout the empire. A City committee for collecting funds was ultimately appointed, and donations were announced amounting to more than £4000. The Goldsmiths' Company have voted £2000 to the college.

A return has been issued which shows that of a total population in Scotland of 3,735,536 those who speak Gaelic number 231,602. The three greatest Gaelic-speaking counties are Inverness (27,117, Ross and Cromarty (56,767), Argyll (50,113).

THE COURT.

The journey from England to Mentone was accomplished most satisfactorily, her Majesty and Princess Beatrice arriving there at a quarter past four, p.m., on the 16th inst., but little fatigued. The English Vice-Consul met the Royal visitors at the temporary station, opposite her Majesty's residence, no official reception being desired. Mr. Henfrey received the Queen and Princess Beatrice at the entrance of the Chalet des Rosiers, where every minutia had been considered to ensure her Majesty's comfort and repose. A bouquet from the municipality of Mentone had been sent to the chalet anticipatory of the Royal arrival. Bouquets were also presented to the Queen en route by the daughter of the British Consul at Cherbourg, and by the Marquis of Camden at Cannes. Her Majesty had a good night's rest after her arrival, and, with the Princess, drove out the next day towards Cap Martin, the streets being still decorated as upon her arrival. The King and Queen of Saxony visited the Queen on Saturday; and her Majesty paid a visit to the Château d'Orengo at Mortola. On Sunday Divine service was performed at the Chalet des Rosiers by the Rev. Frederick Anson, Canon of Windsor, the Queen and Princess and the Royal household attending. Princess Beatrice visited the King and Queen of Saxony at the Hôtel des Iles Britanniques; and in the evening Prince Leopold arrived from England. A fête was given in the town on Tuesday evening in honour of the Royal visitors. Her Majesty's ironclad Inflexible, stationed off Mentone, fired salutes during the festivities. The Queen and Princess drive out daily, her Royal Highness often patronising the shops of the town; she has also visited the Magnal Artistio Pottery Works.

The Queen has caused a memorial-stone to be placed over the grave of the late Mr. Andrew Toward, in Whippingham churchyard. It bears the following inscription, written by her Majesty:—"To the memory of Andrew Toward, for twenty-nine years the faithful land steward of Queen Victoria and the Prince Consort, by whom he was much esteemed. Born 21st December, 1795; died 7th May, 1881."

Her Majesty has expressed her intention of opening Epping Forest early in May.

Princess Beatrice has sent £50 to the Princess Frederica's Convalescent Home for Women after Childbirth; and the Duke of Albany has sent £10 towards the funds of the Kingston-on-Thames Industrial Exhibition.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales were at the Sandown Park Meeting last Saturday, when his Royal Highness's horse, Fairplay, won the Household Brigade Cup. Their Royal Highnesses had a dinner party in the evening, at which Princess Louise of Lorne was present. Covers were laid for thirty-six, and the bands of the 1st Life Guards and of Signor Raimo performed during and after dinner. The Prince and Princess and their daughters attended Divine service as usual on Sunday. His Royal Highness, accompanied by Princess Louise of Lorne, visited the Victoria Hospital for Sick Children, Queen's-road, Chelsea, on Monday; and the Prince and Princess dined with the Duke of Cambridge, the Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, and Prince Adolphus, the Hereditary Grand Duke, being of the guests. Their Royal Highnesses inspected Mr. Alma Tadema's studio on Tuesday. The Duke and Duchess of Connaught and the Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz dined at Marlborough House. The Prince and the Duke of Connaught went to the St. James's Theatre, and afterwards his Royal Highness and the Princess went to the Countess of Rosebery's dance at Lansdowne House. The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh and Prince Christian have lunched with their Royal Highnesses; and the Prince has visited Mr. Agnew's picture-gallery, and also Mr. J. E. Boehm's and Mr. H. Johnson's studios. His Royal Highness attended the third concert of the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society, at St. Andrew's Hall; and also went with Prince Leopold to see "Ours" at the Haymarket Theatre. The Prince and Princess visited the Channel Tunnel works at Shapere Cliff, Dover, on Wednesday; and their Royal Highnesses go to the Crystal Palace to-day (Saturday) to see the Electrical Exhibition.

Their Royal Highnesses have consented to open, in June next, the Convalescent Home at St. Leonards.

Princes Albert Victor and George of Wales, who returned to Cairo on Monday, have left for Syria and Palestine.

Princess Louise of Lorne's birthday was celebrated with the usual honours last Saturday, and the band of the Duke of York's School came early in the morning and played beneath her Royal Highness's windows at Kensington Palace.

The Duke and Duchess of Connaught arrived at Buckingham Palace on Monday from Windsor, en route for Biarritz. On the same day the Duke and Prince Christian lunched with the Lord Mayor at the Mansion House and afterwards took part in a large meeting held there in support of the proposed Royal College of Music. In the evening the Duke and Duchess went to the Avenue Theatre. Their infant daughter remains at Windsor Castle.

The Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz and Prince Adolphus, hereditary Grand Duke, arrived last Saturday at St. James's Palace on a visit to the Duchess of Cambridge.

Duke Ernest Günther of Schleswig-Holstein has arrived at Cumberland Lodge on a visit to Prince and Princess Christian.

FASHIONABLE MARRIAGES.

The Earl of Winton and Lady Georgiana Hamilton, daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Abercorn, were married on the 16th inst., at St. George's, Hanover-square, the Prince and Princess of Wales and the Duke of Cambridge being present. The bride came accompanied by her mother and was met by her father and her bridesmaids—Lady Jane and Lady Sybella Turnour, sisters of the bridegroom; and her four nieces, Lady Florence Anson, Lady Katherine Lambton, Lady Frances Spencer Churchill, and Lady Evelyn Fitzmaurice. The register was attested by all the Royal personages present, and the Duke and Duchess of Teck breakfasted with the wedding party at Hampden House. Lord and Lady Winton left for Miss Featherstonhaugh's seat, Appark, near Petersfield, for the honeymoon. The wedding presents, upwards of 300 in number, included from the Queen an Indian shawl, and from the Prince and Princess of Wales a ruby, diamond, and pearl bangle bracelet; and the Duke and Duchess of Teck gave a case of silver salt-cellars and spoons.

The Earl of Mount Charles (Scots Guards), eldest son of Marquis Conyngham, and the Hon. Frances Elizabeth Eveleigh-de-Moulins, eldest daughter of Lord and Lady Ventry, were married, by special license, at All Saints' Church, Emsmore-gardens, on Tuesday. The bridesmaids were Ladies Blanche, Jane Seymour, Maud, and Florence Conyngham (sisters of the bridegroom), the Hon. Mildred, the Hon. Hersey, and the Hon. Maud Eveleigh-de-Moulins (sisters of the bride), and Lady Helen Carnegie.

The marriage of the Hon. and Rev. Arnold de Grey with Miss Margaret Pousonby, daughter of the Hon. Spencer and Mrs. Pousonby-Fane, will take place on April 17.

The tower of St. John's Church, Hammersmith, which was dedicated on Saturday, completes the fabric, and finishes a work of thirty years.

The Rev. Harry Jones, Vicar of St. George's-in-the-East and Prebendary of St. Paul's, has accepted the rectory of Great Barton, near Bury St. Edmunds, in the gift of Sir Charles Bunbury.

The Bishop of Rochester consecrates the new chancel of the parish church of St. Mary, Lewisham, to-day (Saturday); the Earl of Dartmouth, Viscount Lewisham, M.P., Sir Charles Mills, Bart., M.P., Mr. J. G. Talbot, M.P., and others, taking part in a meeting which is to follow.

The new bell, "Great Paul," was successfully rung in the presence of the Cathedral authorities last Saturday in the foundry at Loughborough. It was swung on its own headstock, supported on temporary timbering, and is the first bell of its size which has been rung properly in this way.

On Sunday the Rev. S. F. Green completed a year's imprisonment, having been remitted to Lancaster Castle for contempt of Lord Penzance's monition on March 19, 1881. The day was observed as one of special prayer for the reverend gentleman's release in several metropolitan and provincial churches.

The President of Corpus Christi, Oxford, the Rev. J. Fowler, Professor of Logic, and formerly Sub-Rector of Lincoln College, has been presented with a handsome six-branch silver candelabrum by the graduate and undergraduate members of Lincoln College, as a testimonial of respect, on the occasion of his appointment to the presidency of Corpus.

Dr. Tristram, Q.C., the Chancellor of London, sitting in the Consistorial Court at St. Paul's Cathedral on Monday, granted a faculty to pull down the old Church of St. Paul, Hammersmith, and to build a new one. A faculty was granted in the same court to make improvements in the old churchyard of St. Mary, Haggerston. It is proposed to remove some of the gravestones, to effect improvements in the walks, and to plant it with trees and shrubs.

The thirty-first report of the Church Estates Commissioners was issued on Wednesday morning. It states the transactions approved by the Commissioners between August, 1851, and March, 1881, were 3201 in number. During this year they have approved the terms agreed upon in four cases—three being cases of sales of reversions and one a case of a purchase of a leasehold interest. The aggregate number of cases approved by the Commissioners is, therefore, 3205.

At a meeting held in Newcastle on Monday, under the presidency of the Bishop of Durham, a committee of ladies, headed by Lady Ridley, Lady James, Lady Armstrong, and Lady Trevelyan, was appointed, with the object of raising funds for furnishing Bewell Tower as an offering in perpetuity with the new see of Newcastle, and in completion of the munificent gift of Mr. J. W. Pease. Subscriptions to the amount of £250 were announced; and it was intimated that Mr. and Mrs. Pease had determined to hand over the fittings, representing about £250, to the fund.

A painted window (by Mr. Charles Evans, of Warwick-street), in memory of the Rev. Curteis Young Norwood, has been erected in Sevington church, Kent. Mr. E. Vere Nicoll has given another stained-glass window (by Messrs. Lavers, Barrard, and Westlake) to Tidmington church. A stained-glass window (by Clayton and Bell) has recently been placed on the north side of St. Stephen's Church, Avenue-road, in memory of the Rev. Henry A. G. Oliver, M.A., of Jesus College, Cambridge, late head master of St. John's-wood School, Acacia-road, by his affectionate pupils and friends. During the present week St. Andrew's, Nottingham, has been further beautified by the erection of a single-light vestry window, by Messrs. I. A. Gibbs and Harwood, of Charlotte-street, Fitzroy-square, London.

The Society for Promoting, Building, and Repairing of Churches and Chapels held its usual monthly meeting at the society's house, No. 7, Whitehall, on the 16th inst.—the Ven. Archdeacon Harrison in the chair. Grants of money were made in aid of the following objects:—Building new churches at Forest Gate, St. Saviour's, in the parish of West Ham, Essex, £200; Roath St. German, near Cardiff, £500, 11. M. fund; and Southsea, St. Peter's, Hants, £250; rebuilding the church at East Looe, Cornwall, £125; and steeple, St. Lawrence and All Saints', near Maldon, Essex, £100; and towards reseating and restoring the church at Chalgrove, near Wallingford, Oxon, £20. Grants were also made from the Special Missions Building Fund towards building mission churches at New Lodge, in the parish of Llannon, near Llanelly, £25; and the Brook, in the parish of St. Mary's, Chatham, Kent, £45. The society likewise accepted the trust of a sum of money as a repair fund for the Churches of St. Barnabas and St. John the Baptist, Pimlico.—The Archbishop of Canterbury has appointed Friday, May 26, at 2.30 p.m., for the annual general court.

FINE ARTS.

The Exhibition of the Society of Lady Artists was opened on Monday last at their gallery, Great Marlborough-street. The collection is very numerous, especially in the department of water-colour drawings, although many of the lady artists are absent whose presence would be required to render the display adequately representative of what women can do and are doing in art. There are, however, several works which reveal artistic accomplishment or aptitude. Among these may be named "London Bridge," by Miss Clara Montalba; "Through the Wood," by Miss Linnie Watt; "Morning" and "Evening in South Germany," by Miss Fanny Assenbaum; "The Family Bible," by Miss Manning; Miss Louisa Rayner's town views; Miss F. Reason's "Arab Chieftain"; Miss Mansell's amusing "Husband of the Future," darning his own stockings, or those of his strong-minded wife, while she is perhaps lecturing on the rights of women; and contributions by Mrs. Alma Tadema, Miss Ellen Partridge, Mrs. C. Whitlaw, Mrs. Valentine Bromley, Miss Kate Gray, Mrs. Marable, Miss Watson, Miss Leman, &c.

The second exhibition of the Society of Painter-Etchers is open at the Fine-Art Society's gallery, New Bond-street. We have already expressed the opinion that the title of this society is too exclusive and invidious, seeing that it does not recognise the fact that many of the finest etchings of modern times (such, for instance, as those of Unger, Waltner, Brunet, Debains, and many others) are translations from pictures. Nor, probably, is it technically accurate; for some of the etchings admitted are by amateurs, or professionals who can scarcely claim to rank as painters. The assumption implied in the title has, doubtless, originated from the present fashionable exaggeration of the value of the resources of etchings as means of original, or at least of complete, art expression. However, notwithstanding the limitation allowed to, and although the gathering consists only of works not before exhibited, the display is extensive and interesting. Many of the best-known etchers are represented, including Messrs. Herkomer, Macbeth, Law, MacWhirter, Frank Holl, Slocombe, Le Gros, Holloway, Chaddock, and others. Two of the most striking productions are Mr. Haig's architectural pieces, "Chartres" and "The Church of San Fermo Maggiore, Verona," both distinguished by their fine feeling for the picturesque, their effective light and shade, and skilful execution. There are also some etchings by the president, Mr. Seymour Haden, remarkable, especially as the work of an amateur, for their artistic suggestiveness and freedom of treatment.

There is also on view at the same gallery a collection of the original designs made for Dalziel's Bible Gallery, which we have already reviewed. These include drawings by Sir Frederick Leighton, Messrs. Watts, Poynter, Holman Hunt, Armitage, Madox Brown, Sandys, F. R. Pickersgill, and other artists of note. Some of the designs derive special interest from being drawn directly on the wood.

The Lord Mayor is about to present to the City of London a bust of the Prince of Wales to be placed in the Mansion House, and has commissioned Mr. R. C. Belt to execute it.

Sir Charles Dilke, M.P., in presenting the prizes to the successful students of the Broadway Science and Art classes at Hammersmith, took the opportunity of making a few observations upon art in general.

Messrs. Sotheby on Monday offered for sale at their rooms in Wellington-street, Strand, the collection of engravings and etchings formed by the late Lord Beaconsfield. There were some brisk competitions, but no high prices were realised.

The grand advance in photographic portraiture recently made in England is exemplified by the panel-portraits of Mrs. Langtry, just produced by Messrs. Downey, of Ebury-street, Pimlico, and published by Marion and Co., Soho-square. These portraits are remarkable for their simplicity and grace, and fully entitle English photographic art to take a foremost place in portraiture, as it has hitherto done in landscape.

The annual exhibition of the Turners' Company will be held at the Mansion House on Oct. 3, 4, and 5 next. The competition this year will be in wood; in stone, including porphyry, granite, jasper, agate, serpentine, marble, spur, &c.; in precious stones, diamond cutting and engraving in intaglio and cameo. The prizes include silver and bronze medals, the freedom of the Company, and other awards by the Court, and money gifts.

A sale by auction of the remaining works of J. J. Hill, deceased, of Sutton House, West-hill, Highgate, will take place at the rooms of Messrs. Christie, Manson, and Woods, King-street, St. James-square, on Monday, April 3, and following day, at one o'clock. This sale will prove interesting not only as containing valuable pictures in the late talented artist's best period, but because there will be found among them some clever pictures and finished studies of some of the domestic pets, &c., of Lady Burdett-Coutts.

The Royal Commissioners appointed to inquire into the instruction of the industrial classes of foreign countries in technical and other subjects have issued their first report. The Commissioners have come to the conclusion that the influence of the new laws enacted and proposed in France as to the diffusion of ordinary and superior primary instruction, both literary and technical, can scarcely be overrated. They commend the instruction in the use of tools during the elementary school age as tending to facilitate the learning of a trade, though it may not actually shorten the period of apprenticeship; and they would be glad to see this kind of instruction introduced into some of the elementary schools here. The Commissioners, however, do not recommend the introduction of apprenticeship schools—not, at least, until they have had a more prolonged trial abroad. The gratuitous lectures on literature and science given in all large towns in France are described as very valuable; and the art-teaching in that country is so carefully extended that the number of bona fide working men receiving practical instruction there is greater beyond comparison than it is with us.

Sir Alexander Galt, the High Commissioner for Canada, has returned from Paris.

Sir Henry Parkes, K.C.M.G., the Premier of New South Wales, arrived in London on Tuesday. He is the guest of Mr. Sheriff Ogg.

Count Münster had an assembly on Wednesday night at the German Embassy, Carlton House-terrace, in celebration of the anniversary of the Emperor of Germany's birthday.

His Excellency M. Tissot, the newly-appointed Ambassador from the French Republic to the Court of St. James's, arrived at the French Embassy, Albert-gate, on Tuesday evening, from Paris.

The State apartments of Windsor Castle were reopened on Monday for the first time since the Queen's departure for Mentone, and they are now accessible to the public during the usual hours on Mondays, Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays. The Albert Chapel is open on Wednesdays, Thursdays, Fridays, and Saturdays, from twelve till three without tickets.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

Her Majesty, who is already said to have benefited by her sojourn in the balmy clime of Mentone, could not have chosen a better week in which to apply to Parliament to make suitable provision for his Royal Highness the Duke of Albany on the occasion of his forthcoming marriage with Princess Helen of Waldeck. The application was prefaced by the welcome announcement at the Mansion House on Monday that in May the Queen would formally open Epping Forest, in the preservation of which as a healthy holiday resort the Corporation of the City of London has done itself some degree of honour. It is by such gratifying public appearances as this that loyalty to the Throne is nourished, and the hearts of the people are more closely knit to the reigning Royal family. The wedding grant could not fail, indeed, to be yielded on Thursday with a readier grace by reason of its being heralded by the good news of her Majesty's projected visit to this East-End oasis. It might, in fine, have been foreshadowed that in the House of Lords the Marquis of Salisbury would but vie with Earl Granville in the delivery of carefully-polished eulogies of the bride and bridegroom; and that in the House of Commons (where Mr. Bright was the cause of an amusing interlude on Tuesday by inadvertently keeping his hat on whilst the Speaker read her Majesty's message) on Thursday, the opposition of Mr. Labouchere would but increase the zest with which Mr. Gladstone and Sir Stafford Northcote would advocate the grant, and the great majority of members would vote for it.

The Easter recess will begin for their Lordships, Earl Granville stated on Monday, next Friday, the eve of the Boat-Race, and extend to April 20. Meantime, the House of Lords continues to deal succinctly with questions as various as those which cropped up on Monday—Earl Delawarr's Continuous Brakes Bill, read the second time; Lord Truro's picking to pieces of the Army, amiably deprecated by the Earl of Morley; and the implied condemnation of the Channel Tunnel by Lord Bury, who elicited some laughter by an allusion to the free trips to Dover and the champagne luncheons, whereby opinion favourable to the Tunnel was being manufactured.

The Commons continue to "mark time," so far as legislation is concerned. No Session has more conclusively shown the absolute urgency of reforming the rules of procedure. Measures of Imperial moment are still delayed by the irrepressible garrulity of certain members, whose vanity may to some extent be fed by the inordinately long reports of their frivolous speeches on trifling topics in the morning journals. This Parliamentary egotism on the 16th inst. delayed till midnight Mr. Trevelyan's masterly exposition of the Navy Estimates, which, beginning with a rollicking "Nelson at the Nile" kind of eulogium of "Poor Joe, the Marine," lucidly conveyed the information that in future every Lieutenant of Marines would be promoted after twelve years' service; that the position of Naval Engineers would be improved, and their pay increased; that the total cost of the Navy for the year would be £10,483,901; and that two new ironclads will be laid down, and, in all, 15,502 tons of material built in public yards, and 4640 tons in private yards. The addition to the Board of Admiralty of Mr. George Rendel, from Sir William Armstrong's firm, was commended by Mr. W. H. Smith, who duly praised "the very ample, clear, and satisfactory statement" of Mr. Trevelyan. Lord Henry Lennox, anxious to place before the House the facts he has industriously collected with regard to the remarkable increase in the shipbuilding for the French Navy, pleaded for an early date for the reconsideration of the Estimates. But, ere the adjournment, £2,631,498 was voted for the wages of the seamen and marines.

Mr. Gorst's anti-slavery motion adverse to the charter of the North Borneo Company was overruled yesterday week by a vote of 125 to 62. Mr. Gladstone defending Ministerial recognition of this miniature East India Company much as Earl Granville had done in the Upper House. In Committee of Supply, Mr. Lyon Playfair had the satisfaction of seeing some thousands voted for the public service.

The Closure debate, resumed on Monday, drags its slow length along. Mr. Raikes's lively attack on the Closure brought up the Marquis of Hartington with the emphatic statement that the Government would stand or fall by the coming division on Mr. Marriott's amendment. On Tuesday Mr. Gladstone accorded his support to Mr. Arthur Arnold's resolution in favour of an equalisation of the Parliamentary franchise in town and country, yet did not deem it opportune to go into the question of the redistribution of seats; but the debate was adjourned. Wednesday saw Ireland again in possession with Mr. W. J. Corbett's University Bill for extending educational facilities to Catholic students; but the measure was rejected by 214 to 35 votes, which will probably be construed as "Another injustice to Ireland." Verily, the House will be ripe for the Easter Holiday from April 4 till April 17!

SKETCHES IN THE LOBBY.

The Lobby of the House of Commons is reached by turning to the left hand after entering the central hall of the Palace of Parliament at Westminster; the approach to the House of Lords is by turning to the right. The two Houses of Parliament are so placed that the end of one legislative chamber falls in a direct line with the end of the other; and it would be possible, if all intervening doors were opened at once, for the Speaker in his chair, at one extremity, to see the Sovereign on her throne at the opposite extremity of this august range of apartments. The central hall, midway between the two Houses, is entered from St. Stephen's Hall, where the marble statues of illustrious members of Parliament stand, adjacent to the raised upper floor of Westminster Hall. The visitor will here find himself prohibited from nearer approach to the House of Commons, during a sitting of the House, unless he be admitted by order of a member of the House; in which case he reaches its Lobby, either to meet the honourable gentleman there, or possibly to be favoured with access to the Speaker's Gallery, for the hearing and seeing of the proceedings; which he could otherwise enjoy in the Strangers' Gallery. The policemen on duty outside the Lobby are wont strictly to enforce this rule for the exclusion of unauthorised persons, and, where strangers are allowed to congregate, they have to keep a path clear for the passage of members, no foot being permitted to trespass "over the line." The effect of these regulations upon the attitudes of different groups of visitors in waiting is shown in our Artist's Sketches. They exhibit also, by way of contrast, the figure of one at the door of the House, who has handed a letter or paper to the venerable elderly gentleman on duty there, to be sent in to the member to whom it is addressed. Another Sketch gives an example of the advantage of being "personally conducted," in the case of two charming young ladies, whom a gallant young member of the House is politely ushering into the sacred precincts. Business, however, and that of a kind to engross the whole attention, is stamped on the eager faces of working legislators and party men. as may be seen in the hurried conference of the "Government Whips" with a member whose vote they want to secure. Messages and notes are frequently sent off to fetch recruits for the Parliamentary conflict in progress, when a division seems to be impending; and absent members are summoned from the clubs, or from private houses, with very little ceremony, to come and render their vowed service to the party connection. It is usually at a late hour, eleven or twelve o'clock at night, that the exciting interest of this occupation is most strongly manifested, and the languor of mere waiting and lounging is exchanged for an ardent participation in the pending contest.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Sandown Park never presented a more brilliant spectacle than on Saturday last, when the Household Brigade Steeplechases were run in splendid weather. The Prince and Princess of Wales and the Duke and Duchess of Teck were present, and the members' inclosure was thronged; whilst the free admission of soldiers in uniform to the park lent a great deal of colour to the scene. The racing calls for little comment, but additional interest was given to the Household Brigade Cup by the fact that the Prince of Wales ran Fairplay (11 st. 10 lb.), who divided favouritism with Shabbington (10 st. 10 lb.). A capital race between the pair resulted in the neck victory of Fairplay, who was patiently ridden by the Hon. L. White, and the success of the Royal colours was very warmly received.

The first day at Lincoln was another blow to Monday racing, for it is very difficult to pick out an item on the card that possesses the smallest degree of interest. Though there were eight runners for the Trial Stakes, it proved a mere exercise canter for Henry George, the Lincolnshire Handicap disappointment of last season, and he has certainly grown into a grand-looking horse, though he would have been all the better for a few more gallops. The Tathwell Plate, the first two-year-old race of the season, went to St. Vincent, a son of Rosicrucian and May Queen; and, though he won easily enough, he will never be successful in anything like good company. There were eleven runners for the Brocklesby Stakes, which was the great event of Tuesday. Nothing was really fancied except Allonso, a son of Julius, who was bred by Matthew Dawson, and sold by him to the Duke of Portland a few days ago. He ran well up to the distance, where Petticoat came out full of running, and won by five lengths. She is by Blair Athol from Crinon, and only cost Sir John Astley 400 gs. at the last Cobham sale; so this one race will repay her purchase-money with handsome interest. Pebble was third; and amongst those that attracted favourable notice we may mention Kengyel, a handsome colt bred in Hungary; Auctioneer, and Belle Henriette. Cuba, a daughter of Springfield and Croisade, took the Sudbrook Selling Plate, and was bought in at 260 gs. over her entered selling price. The "jumping" events at the meeting proved complete failures. A field of twenty-five for the Lincolnshire Handicap showed a falling off from the field of last year, still the general average of starters for the race was well maintained. Buchanan (8 st.) made a good bid to repeat his victory of 1881, but had to be content with third place to Poulet (8 st. 6 lb.), who was followed home by Master Waller (7 st. 13 lb.), a stable companion of Buchanan, but trained at Newmarket, whilst the grey was prepared at Manton.

The Grand National Steeplechase is arranged for decision too late for notice this week.

But for the terribly hard state of the ground there would have been a very brilliant coursing meeting at Gosforth Park last week, for the Gold Cup had secured 128 entries, including nearly all the best greyhounds of the day. As it was, Marshal MacMahon, Ben-y-Lair, and three or four others lamed themselves so badly that they had to be withdrawn, and such as Snowlight, Debonnaire, and Match Girl, could not run in anything like their proper form. Alec Halliday, who has won two other gold cups at Gosforth Park, was again successful, after a display of the most extraordinary gameness and determination. He was very lame after each course, but struggled on undiminished, and beat Waterford, an own brother to Snowlight, in the final course. Mr. Alexander's success was very popular, and Alec Halliday has now won £950 for him in stakes since the beginning of the season. Mr. Hedley's judging was never once fairly called in question, but Bodiman might have slipped better on the first day.

At the time of writing we have not seen either of the University crews, who only came to Putney in the middle of the week. In spite of the unprecedented fact of their stroke only weighing 9 st. 2 lb., reports are all in favour of the Oxonians, and it looks as though long odds would be laid on them on Saturday next.

Two rather important sculling matches have recently taken place over the Putney to Mortlake course. D. Godwin and L. Gibson met for the fourth time; and, after a fine race as far as Hammersmith Bridge, the former won pretty easily. On Monday, G. Bulbear conceded D. Silver a start of five seconds; and, though the latter held a very long lead at the end of a mile, he could do nothing in the rough water in Corney Reach, and Bulbear had matters all his own way from that point.

The Inter-University Sports will take place at Lillie-bridge on Friday next; and, as far as can be judged before the termination of the Cambridge Sports, the "odd" event should fall to Oxford.

According to the Solicitors' Journal, the opening ceremony of the Royal Courts of Justice has been fixed provisionally for the first day of next Trinity Sittings.

A highly influential meeting was held on Tuesday afternoon at Mrs. Gladstone's, Downing-street, with the object of establishing a convalescent home for those recovering from scarlet fever. The Bishop of London presided, and the Princess Louise and the Duchess of Teck were present. Mr. Gladstone, in moving the first resolution, made a powerful appeal for the establishment of the home, and resolutions were passed affirming its necessity and promising to assist the committee already appointed to take steps for its establishment. The other speakers were the First Lord of the Treasury, Colonel Stanley, M.P., Dr. Andrew Clark, Sir Rutherford Alcock, Dr. Broadbent (senior physician to the London Fever Hospital), the Earl of Rosebery, Sir R. Cross, M.P., the Bishop of Lincoln, Sir J. Fayer, Sir Fowel Buxton, and Mr. Dodson, M.P. The Lord Mayor, who occupied the chair on account of the Bishop of London having to leave, announced a list of subscriptions amounting to more than £4000, including £1000 from an anonymous donor, and £100 each from Lady Burdett-Coutts, Mr. Burdett-Coutts, Bartlett, the Earl of Dudley, the Earl of Rosebery, Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, Messrs. Baring, Messrs. Coutts, Mrs. Gladstone, Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Lady Louisa Goldsmid, the Worshipful Company of Grocers, Messrs. Hoare, In Memoriam, B. B., Messrs. Williams, Deacon, Mr. W. Willink, and one hundred guineas each from the Mercers' and Clothworkers' Companies.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

SPAIN.

Upon the reassembling of the Cortes on Monday, Señor Camacho read the bill authorising the conversion of the debt. He said he had been assured that the majority of the bondholders would accept the terms proposed.

ITALY.

The Chamber of Deputies on Tuesday adopted the bill for the drainage of marsh lands. The House subsequently voted several other bills; amongst them one creating a body of men to act in association with the Red Cross Society, and granting them the free use of railways, posts, and telegraphs in time of war.

HOLLAND.

On Monday the Second Chamber rejected by 35 votes to 24 the conclusions of the committee of petitions with reference to General Van der Heyden's demand for a Parliamentary inquiry into the matter of the alleged cruel treatment of native prisoners in Achene.

GERMANY.

The Emperor had the misfortune to slip and fall when leaving the Academy in Berlin last Saturday, and sustained slight bruises on the elbow and knee; but he took his usual drive on Sunday, when he was enthusiastically greeted. He had a conference with Prince Bismarck on Tuesday.

Last Saturday, the Lower House of the Prussian Diet read the third time the bill for the purchase by the State of several private railways in the same form in which it was adopted on the second reading. The whole bill was then finally agreed to.

The Prussian Economic Council has rejected the Tobacco Monopoly Bill, and Prince Bismarck has stated that he will not dissolve the Reichstag if it reject the bill, but will leave the question to time.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

The Electoral Reform Bill was discussed last Saturday in the Lower House of the Austrian Reichsrath.

The Lower House of the Hungarian Diet on Monday resumed the debate on the bill amending the Army law. The Upper House finally approved the Budget for 1882.

SWEDEN AND NORWAY.

King Oscar, having refused the concessions claimed by the Norwegian Storthing, the Republican majority in the Chamber has struck out the usual title of "Most Gracious" in the Address to the King, simply saying "to the King."

The Queen has arrived from Stockholm at Amsterdam, where her Majesty purposes staying in the Amstel Hotel for some weeks under the medical treatment of Dr. Mezger.

RUSSIA.

A Court dinner was given by the Czar at Gatschina on Wednesday, to celebrate the eighty-fifth birthday of the German Emperor.

It is now stated that the coronation of the Emperor has been finally fixed to take place in August.

The Emperor has allotted 20,000 roubles to the Russian Geographical Society as a subsidy towards a second Polar station in Nova Zembla.

The theatre of the French Opéra Bouffe recently constructed in St. Petersburg took fire last Saturday night during a performance. The flames spread rapidly, the building being chiefly of wood. No life, however, was lost.

GREECE.

The King has accepted the new Cabinet formed by M. Tricoupis, and the Ministers took the oaths of office on the 15th inst. The Chamber of Deputies have appointed, on the motion of the late Premier, M. Coumoundouros, a committee to inquire into the misappropriation of public funds at Thebes.

AMERICA.

The House of Representatives, by 199 votes to 42, has passed the bill prohibiting polygamy. It goes to the President for approval. Congress has authorised the Secretary for War to give employment to the destitute by strengthening the Mississippi levees. The Senate has prepared an ocean mail subsidy scheme, which proposes to appropriate for ocean-going mail steamers five millions sterling, to be spread over ten years. The advantages are to be restricted to Americans.

Madame Patti sang before an audience of five thousand in Boston, when the curtain caught fire from the footlights and was consumed. A panic was narrowly escaped, but, as it was, no harm was done.

INDIA.

The Viceroy and Lady Ripon left Calcutta on Friday evening and arrived at Simla on Tuesday. The various Government officers are on their way to the hills.

SOUTH AFRICA.

At the opening of the Cape Parliament yesterday week Sir Hercules Robinson stated that the Ministers could not advise the abandonment of Basutoland, but would try to enforce the law by a moderate force.

Later news received at Durban confirms the reported fighting on the south-western border of the Transvaal between the Boers and the natives, in which the latter had so far been successful.

Three earthquake shocks were felt on Tuesday in the Island of Chios, and the population has taken refuge in tents.

The Australian cricketers who are to play in England this season left Melbourne by mail-steamer on the 16th inst.

Severe floods have occurred in Brazil, by which four towns have been nearly destroyed and many persons drowned.

The President of the Argentine Republic, General Roca, opened the Buenos Ayres Exhibition on the 15th inst.

The Théâtre National at Algiers was burned down early on Monday morning, and only the four walls are left standing. There was no loss of life.

The revenue of the Swiss Confederation for the financial year just expired is nearly three million of francs in excess of the estimate.

A Danish expedition to the North Pole, to start in July next, has been arranged, and the Chamber has voted a substantial sum towards the expenses.

The Times of India says that a herd of sixty-five wild elephants has been captured in a single drive by Mr. Sanderson in the Garo Hills, on the north-eastern frontier of Bengal.

Garibaldi's seventy-fifth birthday was (a Daily News telegram from Naples says) celebrated on Sunday morning under the favourable auspices of lovely weather, the warmest sympathy, and undisturbed order. The veterans of 1860 marched in procession to Santa Lucia, where they embarked for the Villa Maclean, their band playing alternately the "Royal March" and "Garibaldi's Hymn," enthusiastically applauded by the crowd. Several other steamers followed, carrying large numbers of people. On their arrival Garibaldi appeared, for the first time since his recovery, in the open air, and responded to the deafening cheers by waving his handkerchief.

GENERAL HOME NEWS.

Mr. P. Edward Dove, of Lincoln's Inn, has been unanimously elected Secretary to the Royal Historical Society.

During the second week of March, 52,812 indoor and 43,920 outdoor paupers were relieved in the metropolis, making a total of 96,731, as against 98,752 in the corresponding week of last year. The vagrants relieved last week numbered 740.

Next Friday evening the festival dinner of the governor and friends of the British Home for Incurables, Clapham-rise, will be held to celebrate the coming of age of the institution, the Lord Mayor presiding.

Mr. R. H. Wood, J.P., of Rugby, is about to confer on the town a free hospital for the poor. The gift will include a freehold site of ten acres just outside the town, a new hospital for thirty beds, and ample endowment to maintain the institution in proper working order. The value of this gift to the town is estimated at £30,000.

The Earl of Dunraven presided yesterday week at the ninety-ninth anniversary festival of the Benevolent Society of St. Patrick at the Freemasons' Tavern. The chairman expressed his regret that the society was not at all in so prosperous a condition as it should be, and made an appeal for its more liberal support. The subscriptions amounted to £800.

Lady Emma Baring, daughter of the First Lord of the Admiralty, touched the electric stud on Tuesday releasing the Colossus, which was thereupon successfully launched from the Portsmouth Dockyard. The Colossus is sister ship to the Edinburgh, launched on Monday at Pembroke Dock, and these are the first two British armoured ships made of steel.

The Registrar General's report shows that the Metropolitan annual death-rate declined last week to 22.7 per thousand of the population. The 1691 deaths included 8 from smallpox, 36 from measles, 26 from scarlet fever, 13 from diphtheria, 157 from whooping-cough, 2 from typhus fever, 21 from enteric fever, 4 from ill-defined forms of continued fever, 13 from diarrhoea and dysentery, and 1 from simple cholera.

Mr. Joseph Farndale, late of Leicester, the Chief Constable of Birmingham, has been presented with a magnificent silver salver and £200 by the Mayor of Leicester, in the Crown Court, in the presence of a large number of spectators. Superintendent John Smith, of Newcastle, has been chosen to fill the office of Head Constable of Durham, vacant by the appointment of the late chief to the head of the Leicester police.

The Electric Exhibition at the Crystal Palace, now to be seen in all its brilliancy, was on Monday evening inspected with evident interest by Mr. Gladstone, the Earl of Derby, Lord Granville, and other distinguished personages, at the instigation of Mr. John Pender, M.P., whose name is inseparably associated with submarine telegraphy. The Prime Minister and party were entertained at dinner on the occasion by Mr. Pender.

Recently Mr. Williams, of London, bought the Carlton Hotel, Margate, facing the sea, and presented it to the Young Men's Christian Association in London, and the local branch. By the former it will be used as a home, and by the latter as a reading-room. Mr. Bevan, of London, has since presented £500 towards the expense of erecting a large hall at the rear, and another gentleman has undertaken to bear the cost of furnishing the entire premises.

A long discussion took place at a meeting of the Commissioners of Sewers on Tuesday, in reference to what was denounced as the extravagance of the London School Board, from which a precept was presented for the payment of £86,480. Resolutions were passed protesting against the proposed establishment of higher elementary schools in the metropolis, and generally against the extravagant nature of much of the School Board outlay.

At the meeting of the Metropolitan Board of Works yesterday week it was resolved that Hammersmith Bridge be closed on the day of the University boat-race from two hours before to two hours after the time appointed for the race. A report of the Bridges Committee was also agreed to recommending that the bridge be reconstructed with an increased width of carriage-way and footways, and that the foundations of the southern pier of the bridge be strengthened, at a total estimated cost of £80,000.

Favoured with beautiful weather, the parades on Saturday of some twenty regiments of metropolitan Volunteers were in each case largely attended, the estimated total number of all ranks under arms being about 9000.—Lieutenant-Colonel the Duke of Sutherland, K.G., has resigned the command, which he has held since January, 1864, of the 1st Sutherland (Highland) Regiment of Rifle Volunteers, of which the Prince of Wales is honorary colonel. His Grace is permitted to retain his rank and to continue to wear the uniform of the corps on his retirement.

General approval was expressed at the monthly meeting of the Zoological Society on the 16th inst. of the action of the council in disposing of the elephant Jumbo. Professor Flower, who presided, said his anxiety about the animal had been so great for some time that he would willingly have let it go for nothing. The report expressed the opinion of the council that they ought not to incur a large expenditure merely to retain a single animal of no special scientific interest. Professor Huxley said he thought the council had acted properly. Messrs. Burdett and Hill explained their reasons for bringing the matter before the Court of Chancery, disclaiming any hostility to the council and officers.—Jumbo was placed in his box last Wednesday, preparatory to his removal.

Mrs. Fawcett presided last Tuesday at a crowded meeting of the University College Women's Debating Society, when the question, "Have the greatest things in literature and art ever been accomplished by a people contented with political subservience?" was freely discussed. Commenting on the various arguments brought forward by the different speakers, Mrs. Fawcett said there was no doubt but that there was a definite relation between political freedom and great achievements in literature and art; and she then deduced from this an ingenious hypothesis to the effect that women's notable inferiority to men in certain fields of work might be put down to the state of political pupillage in which they had been kept. She concluded by urging her hearers to do their utmost to secure for themselves their due share of political privilege.

Messrs. Hamilton, Crichton, and Co., goldsmiths, of George-street, Edinburgh, have recently finished a handsome piece of plate for the Royal Highlanders, the Black Watch. It is a large cigar-box. On the front of the lid is a representation of Edinburgh Castle; while on the back, Holyrood Palace and Arthur's Seat are engraved. It is panelled all round: in the front panel is a representation of the fighting at Cooassie; while on the back one the Battle of Alexandria is the subject; the smaller panels being filled in with designs of the medals which the regiment has won. The whole is surmounted by a fine smoke-coloured cuirass. The badge of the regiment, engraved on the back, shows most distinctly when looked at from the front. This plate is the Army Inter-regimental Rifle prize won last year by the 1st battalion of the Royal Highlanders (late the 42nd). The same firm have executed a handsome snuffbox for the Sergeants' Mess.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

Messrs. Forsyth Brothers have just brought out, in handy quarto size, a "Heller" album and a "Reinecke" album. The former contains some charming pieces, by the most imaginative of living composers, for the pianoforte, these being copyright works, consisting of three new studies (op. 139), the series of movements entitled "Voyage autour de ma Chambre" (op. 140), four "Barcarolles" (op. 141), variations on a theme by P. Schumann (op. 142), and two caprices (op. 144) on subjects from Mendelssohn. All these pieces are distinguished by graceful and imaginative fancy, and are, moreover, valuable as studies of mechanism and rhythm. The selection from Reinecke comprises some charming pianoforte compositions by the excellent Leipsic Capellmeister, beginning with his "Southern Pictures" (op. 86), and including a "Gavotte" (from op. 129), twenty-four characteristic pieces (op. 137), and three characteristic morceaux (op. 136). Both the collections referred to are edited by Mr. Charles Hallé, who has supplied copious fingering, which gives special value to these editions.

Messrs. Forsyth Brothers contribute some graceful pianoforte compositions: notably "A Lullaby," by Leo Kerbusch; "The Initials" (sonata based on the initials of Professor Macfarren's Christian names), by W. H. Holmes; and a "Courante," "Scherzino," and "Bourrée and Musette," by E. Hecht.

From the "Edizioni Ricordi" the following songs may be selected as being especially pretty:—"Chanson de Fortunio," "Senza di Te," and "E morto Pulcinella!" by F. P. Tosti.

Messrs. Schott, of Regent-street (of Mayence, Paris, and Brussels), have recently published some pianoforte pieces by Signor Sgambati, whose pianoforte playing and compositions for his instrument have recently attracted much attention abroad. His "Fogli Volanti" consist of eight short pieces, in each of which there is individuality of character in accordance with its distinctive title. They are not only interesting in themselves, but also as studies of various forms of mechanism. His two "Etudes de Concert" are bravura pieces calling for high and special executive powers, and may be practised with advantage by the most skilful pianist. In his transcription of a melody by Gluck, Signor Sgambati has surrounded the theme by a rich under-current of accompaniment, keeping the subject clear by the use of a third stave independent of the accompaniment and the bass.

"The Nibelung's Ring" (Messrs. Schott) is a translation into English, from the original German, of Wagner's opera-dramas produced at Bayreuth in 1876, and to be given here next May at Her Majesty's. The series consists of the introductory "Das Rheingold," followed by "Die Walküre," "Siegfried," and "Götterdämmerung," which were originally produced at Bayreuth in 1876, in the theatre specially built for the purpose, as recorded at the time. It is scarcely necessary to remind readers that the words of Wagner's operas are his own, and these have been printed, in the cases now referred to, by Messrs. Schott, the eminent publishers of Mayence. The book now alluded to is a clever adaptation, by Mr. Alfred Forman, who has successfully imitated the alliterative verse of the original. The forthcoming production of these operas in London, in the original text, will be a great speciality in our musical season; and those who intend hearing them, and are not familiar with German, will do well to make themselves acquainted with the dramas by the aid of Mr. Forman's translations.

Novello, Ewer, and Co.'s "Pianoforte Albums" continue to be issued at intervals, recent numbers being appropriated to a selection of marches, some originally written for the pianoforte; others transcribed for that instrument from orchestral works. The contents of the two numbers now referred to (7 and 8) are of a varied and interesting nature, including pieces by Handel, Mozart, Schubert, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Weber, and more recent composers. The printing and engraving are excellent, and the price places the work within the reach of all purchasers.

"Here and Hereafter" (Messrs. Enoch and Sons) is an expressive song by Phoebe Otway. The melody is clearly defined and of essentially vocal character, and the accompaniment judiciously varied.

Very welcome are some songs of a refined character from the pen of the late Fabio Campana, the well-known composer of many successful and popular duets. "Winged Wishes," "Courtship," "Our Last Good-bye," and "Land Ahead" are amongst the most pleasing. They are published by Alfred Hays (late C. Lonsdale).

Lady Florence Dixie has issued, in the form of a pamphlet (Chatto and Windus), a "Defence of Zululand and its Kings," in which she undertakes "to prove that in the invasion of that country we committed not only a grave mistake, but a gross injustice."

"Debrett's Peerage, Baronetage, and Knighthood" has this year seventeen pages added to the "Peerage," seventeen to the "Baronetage," and eight to the "Knighthood," besides a new section of eighty-seven pages, in which appear biographical sketches of the Companions of Orders of Knighthood, and of the Indian Empire. Particulars of the services rendered by officers in recent wars are also recorded, and the new Territorial Regimental designations are given. Every effort appears to have been made to secure accuracy, the editor, Mr. R. H. Mair, LL.D., having submitted upwards of 25,000 proofs for correction to ladies and gentlemen whose names appear in the work, and in over 18,000 cases replies were given.—"Debrett's House of Commons and Judicial Bench," edited by Mr. Mair, and published by Messrs. Dean and Son, Fleet-street, has also appeared. This is always a handy book for reference, and has been corrected up to the latest possible date.

Sixpenny reprints of standard works, which had its commencement in Messrs. Longmans' popular illustrated edition of Lady Brassey's "Voyage in the Sunbeam," have become quite general. Messrs. Bradbury, Agnew, and Co. have issued in this form "The Story of a Feather" and "The Caudle Lectures," by Douglas Jerrold, with numerous illustrations by C. Keene, Du Maurier, and others. Messrs. Bentley publish an illustrated sixpenny edition of the "Ingoldsby Legends." Messrs. Routledge are about to publish a sixpenny edition with the original sketches of Mr. Gilbert's famous "Bab Ballads," besides which they have issued new sixpenny editions of "Sandford and Merton," "Robinson Crusoe," "Swiss Family Robinson," and "Grimm's Household Stories"; Messrs. Ward and Lock publish "Hood's Own," and "Out of the Hurly Burly," by Max Adeler; which are to be quickly followed by "Longfellow's Poetical Works," "The Pilgrim's Progress," and "The Arabian Nights." Messrs. Macmillan and Co. publish "Tom Brown's School Days," with illustrations; and Carlyle's "Sartor Resartus" is published by the firm of Chapman and Hall. Messrs. Smith, Elder, and Co.'s edition of Sir Theodore Martin's "Life of the Prince Consort" extends to six numbers. With this exception, these sixpenny editions are complete in one issue.

OUR FEATHERED FRIENDS.

HARBINGERS OF SPRING.

Though generally accounted the first month of Spring, few flowers, save the crocuses and daffodils and a few early violets, have the courage to unfold their frail loveliness to the rude blasts for which March is famous. The leaf-buds still remain closely packed up in their gummy scales and sheaths. The cuckoo and the swallow, and all the rest of the birds that deserted us in October, are still in the sunny South. Amongst the birds, however, which stay with us throughout the year there is considerable activity. A few of them are already building their nests, and some, having broken the spell which winter laid upon them, have again burst forth into song, and are running over the modulations of their varied melodies in low and gentle tones, as if practising to welcome in the Spring, when at length the coy goddess shall vouchsafe to visit us.

One of her earliest heralds, and the most constant in his eagerness to tell us that the fresh young Spring will soon be with us, is the skylark. In the winter months the lark is gregarious in its habits; but in February the large straggling flocks begin to separate and spread themselves in pairs over the surrounding grasslands. Early in March, each bird having chosen its mate, nesting operations are commenced. And it is then that we hear the skylark's vernal song in all its charming freshness. His song is often heard in February, and, if the weather be unusually mild, even as early as January; but it is in the honeymoon of his wedded life, when the winds of March have dispersed the clouds of February, that his voice is at its very best: it is in his love-chant that we find his notes purest and sweetest. Who that hears that rich loud carol of his on the first clear day of March but stops to listen?

When first the lark rises in the early morning from amongst the herbage where his mate is brooding with patient love over her tiny oval treasures, his flight is fluttering and irregular, as though he were loath to leave her. But he is panting for the open vault of heaven, and warbling forth his love to her in tenderest strains, he ceases his irregular flutterings, and mounting the air, apparently without an effort, sails upward into floating cloudlets and the azure beyond, until the eye loses him altogether. But, though the daring warbler has got beyond our range of vision, he showers down upon us a rain of distant melody so full of tender rapture, we cannot choose but wait to see him descend. His hymn of joy is carried away for an instant now and then by a passing breeze; but presently we see him, a tiny speck all but motionless, and gradually his pure sweet notes grow clearer and louder, until, like something hurled from heaven, he drops silently to earth. But he does not fall, thoughtful lover that he is, where his nest lies; for that might betray his dear one. If danger be apprehended, before running through the herbage to his nest, he will stop, and, elevating the feathers on his head into a crest and raising himself to his utmost height, glance warily around; or, if there be imminent peril, he crouches low and hides himself. If, however, he is satisfied that all is right, he at once runs through the herbage, keeping well out of sight, to the humble home he and his little mate have made for themselves. And then, having seen that she is comfortable, having supplied her perhaps with a worm or grub or such-like delicacy, he bounds again from the dewy grass to salute the rising orb of day.

At noon he is silent, but in the afternoon and evening the ethereal minstrel chants forth his ecstasy. "Herald of the morn" as he is, his vesper hymn is scarcely less rapturous than his song of early morning. Indeed, except at noon and when it is raining, all hours of the day find the happy bird indulging in his vernal carol; and no wonder, for Love gives it energy, love gave it birth.

His "lay is in heaven," but his "love is on earth." The bird has a wonderful attachment for the field where his nest is. Though in the course of his aerial wanderings this "pilgrim of the sky" drifts sometimes far away from over his terrestrial haunt, whenever he is on the ground it is always in this one particular field, and nowhere else: even if fired at he will not leave it.

But the skylark's quivering descent is not the only bird-music that gladdens our hearts just now with thoughts of spring. The thrush and the blackbird are in full song. How different are the haunts of these sweet songsters to the open grasslands and wild upland pastures of the skylark! Trees and hedges, which have no charm for our aerial wanderer, are indispensable to the blackbird and the thrush: nor do the deciduous trees suffice them: their haunt is almost always amongst the evergreens—at any rate, until the other trees have put on their summer garb. For both the blackbird and the thrush are shy and retiring in their habits, especially the sable chorister. It is close to our country dwellings, amongst the dark perennial foliage of our shrubberies, that we hear their delightful warblings—where holly, bay-tree, yew, laurel, holly, and ivy, afford them the seclusion they love.

Though the blackbird's song is confined to five or six notes, their full rich mellowness is such as always to attract attention. Indeed, for power and brilliancy of tone, this jet-black vocalist is unrivalled; but for compass and variety, "the merle's dulcet pipe" is not to be compared with the song of the thrush. The thrush's carol is more sustained than the blackbird's; and its purity of intonation and great variety of notes, make it one of the most charming of the year's earlier melodies. Both the blackbird and the thrush build in March.

The skylark, the thrush, and the blackbird are pre-eminently the harbingers of Spring. Other birds there are whose voices are heard thus early in the year, but they are not suggestive of primroses and the budding of trees in such a marked manner as the three songsters we have named. The sweet strain of the redbreast is now at its very best, for he, like all the early singers, pairs early—and, as everyone knows, it is when the birds are "making love" to one another that their song is sweetest. But Robin sings well-nigh throughout the year, and his indescribably sweet little song seems to us suggestive rather of winter's keen and frosty days than of the blossoms and leaves we are longing for. Still, Robin's tender lay harmonises very pleasantly with the season we are contemplating; and he is, moreover, one of the "privileged" birds always lovable, no matter what the time of year.

The hedge-sparrow, the wood-lark, the wren, the yellow-hammer, the chaffinch, and a few others are all early singers; but none of them can be recognised as decidedly harbingers of Spring. The simple little song of the chaffinch is short and monotonous. The three notes of the yellowhammer are very plaintive. The wren's sweet song is sung all the year round. The low and plaintive pipe of the duncock, or hedge-sparrow, is almost as sweet as Robin's, though not so clear and loud; but, like the redbreast's, it is a perennial song: unlike the redbreast, however, he is so very shy and retiring, and so rarely seen, we can hardly call him a herald of Spring. And the wood-lark, whose voice is not only one of the earliest but one of the sweetest we have, is, alas, too scarce.

THE PATRIARCH OF THE ARMENIANS.

THE LATE MR. S. WALTERS, ARTIST, OF LIVERPOOL.

THE LATE MR. S. WALTERS.

The death of Mr. Samuel Walters, of Bootle, Liverpool, an artist well known for his many excellent pictures of ships and other paintings, was announced last week. His works have gained high reputation in America, as well as in England; one being that of the ill-fated steam-ship President, which picture was engraved and dedicated by permission to Martin Van Buren, then President of the United States. His last picture, upon which he was at work within a few days of his death, was a delineation of the fine steamer Purisian, belonging to Messrs. Allan and Co. In his studio he leaves numerous sketches and other works, which when offered to the public will be no doubt eagerly sought after. Among them is the fine picture of the "Port of Liverpool," which is well known by the photographs taken from it and widely distributed. Of late years most of his pictures have been reproduced by photography and sent all over the world. His eldest son, Mr. George S. Walters, also known as an artist, is settled in London, but for many years lived in Bootle and worked with his father, to whom he owes his training in the profession. We present a portrait of the late Mr. Samuel Walters, from a photograph by Mr. W. Keith, of Lord-street, Liverpool.

THE ARMENIAN PATRIARCH.

The complication of political difficulties and anxieties called "the Eastern Question," which is not one but many questions, arising from the incurable corruption of the Turkish Empire, has caused much division of opinions among British statesmen. But there is one matter upon which Conservative and Liberal Ministries have perfectly agreed, from 1878 to 1882, and have used their best efforts to obtain the desired result. The oppressed condition of the Armenian subjects of the Sultan, in different parts of Asia Minor, Northern Syria, and Northern Mesopotamia, has continually occupied the attention of her Majesty's Government. Sir Austen Henry Layard, and subsequently Mr. Goschen, while residing at Constantinople and representing Great Britain there, have been occasionally in communication with the Patriarch of the Armenian Church, Monsignor Nerces, who has supplied authentic details of the state of that ancient Christian community, and has assisted in devising measures for their better protection. It has been stated by this prelate, whose official residence is at Constantinople, that in six Asiatic Vilayets, or provinces—namely, Erzeroum, Van, Sivas, Karpout, Diarbekir, and Aleppo, the Armenians number altogether 700,000. But Colonel C. W. Wilson, British Consul-General in Anatolia or Asia Minor, thinks this is probably an exaggerated estimate. There are supposed, however, to be a million other Armenians scattered about the Turkish Empire. Those dwelling in the original seat of their nation, about the sources of the rivers Tigris and Euphrates, are terribly harassed by the cruel and rapacious Kurdish tribes; they are frequently attacked with great ferocity, their cattle stolen, their villages plundered and burned, many of the men and women killed, and the girls and boys carried off into the worst of slavery. Monsignor Nerces, the Patriarch, has faithfully and strenuously exerted himself, during many years past, to procure the moral and diplomatic intervention of the European Powers on behalf of his afflicted people.

FOR BREAKFAST.
"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operation of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr.
Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a deliciously-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.
Made simply with boiling water or milk.
Sold only in Packed and Labeled.
JAMES EPPS and CO., HOMOEOPATHIC CHEMISTS.

EPPS'S CHOCOLATE ESSENCE.
If cocoa seeds as imported are roasted, then broken up into "bits"—small pieces—and subjected to very high pressure in an hydraulic press, they give out a large per-centage of their oil or butter, which is removed, and the remaining constituents of the bits fall into a powder—Chocolate Essence. This absolute cocoa is left unsweetened. It possesses an alkali-elevating principle or alkaloid to that contained in tea or coffee. It should be boiled like coffee, and affords a beverage of the same consistency. Unaffected by climate. Each packet (6d. or 1s.) or tin (6d., 1s., 4s., 2s. 6d., 7s., or 10s. 6d.) is labelled "James Epps and Co., Homeopathic Chemists, 44, Threadneedle-street; and 170, Finsbury."

EPPS'S ESSENCE SKILLET.—A pot for boiling Epps's Chocolate Essence, and which needs no watching, the speciality being that the contents cannot boil over. Half-Pint size, 1s.; Pint, 1s. 6d.; Two Pints, 1s. 6d.

THE PERFECTION OF PREPARED COCOA.

TAYLOR BROTHERS'
"MARAVILLA" COCOA.

Sold in tin-lined Packets only, by all Grocers.

TAYLOR BROTHERS call the attention of consumers to the high sustaining and nutritive powers possessed by MARAVILLA COCOA and MARAVILLA COCOA ESSENCE. These articles being prepared with great judgment and skill from the choicest growths of the Trinidad and South American estates, compare advantageously with the productions offered by other houses, and a trial is strongly recommended before a preference is finally given to any other description.

The Coloured Picture.

A DUAL LEAP.

Spring was approaching, bird-songs were heard, and the purple-brown of the distant woods was paling day by day; for green was showing, as were primrose-tufts, in hedgerow, copse, and thicket; the month being the boisterous month of March, and the end of it close at hand. It was a brisk, and a blowing, breezy time, that, as the wind met your face as the aspens quivered, made your cheeks of a healthy colour—a wind that was felt by the lambs in the meadows, and that whisked the tails of the teams, as they steadily traversed the rows in the hop-yards, having finished their work for wheat. It was just the right time for a gallop with hounds, or, in their absence, a gallop without them; and it was the latter to which I was then looking forward, in the match we had made for the morrow, to see whose horse was the quickest, and best at his fences; and thus did it come about.

We—I and five others—were having a week of it at an old manor house between Malvern and Worcester, on the coming of age of our friend, Frank Lee; and, on comparing the deeds we had done with hounds, we agreed to a match for a ride across country, with no allowance for weight or age; as, so bumptious were we, through what we had done, that we thought we could beat both the Captain and Lee, though, as gentlemen riders, they had been in three Hunt Steeplechases. The Captain—Stanley—was a first-rate hand, as Frank was, too; and both belonged to the Worcester; whilst Moore and Hayes, who were very straight men with the Ledbury, thought themselves quite as good as were Oldham and Hall, who hailed from the Cotswold country; while, as an old member of the Albrighton Hunt, I myself hoped to “go,” being not badly mounted. An Irish horse was the one Frank rode—“Paddy” by name, and a silver-grey—with a fair-sized head and intelligent eyes, and a strong, low, muscular, bony frame, with feet not too small for the heaviest ground, and with breed enough in him to tell at wide leaps. The Captain’s “Ladybird” was a chestnut mare, with a white blaze down her face; but while a rooney head told she could judge as to distance, and her shoulders and hips that a big place would not stop her, her restless eyes hinted rushing. Hall’s “Skip-Jack”—a dark brown with black points—was an able horse, and known for wall-work in the Cotswold country; and “Nelly O’Neill”—a dun that Oldham had—was a good and a very sure hurdle-jumper; whilst Moore’s “Prince Charlie”—a well-built roan—was a clever and quick performer. Read’s mare, “Sweetbriar”—a golden bay—did timber well, and was bold at water; but not bolder than “Wild Duck,” the one I rode, as he was good at all things alike. The distance was four miles round the farm, a well-fenced ring, and varied; and, though we each felt confident when we saddled, short work was very soon made of it, as Lee and the Captain took the lead, and cleverly managed a “neck-and-neck,” so evenly were they mounted.

This led to a bet between them for a further spin; and in the interim, as Frank had colours, the Captain got his too—the former, canary, with green sleeves and cap; and the latter, black cap, with rose-coloured sleeves and body. As the weather was good, and there had been nothing but showers, the ground was just right when the race came off, and the flags were still up in the willows. The morning was fine, and there was a nice, brisk breeze, that made the fields—where the starlings no longer gathered—be dimmed by broad shadows as they travelled across them, and the rooks soar all the higher; and as the time for the start—twelve o’clock—drew nigh, the sun showed through the grey of the driving clouds, and we all set off with the ladies; at first through pastures of lush green grass—that were dotted with daisies and bee-loved butterbur—and then through a primrose copse: to a spot by the side of it where the finish was fixed, and where banks of white violets made it pleasant to linger. “Go!” was then given, and away they went, the Captain leading. Then, in the second round, as the pace improved, Frank got close to him; when getting the lead at the last fence, where the brook wound by it—as shown in the picture by Mr. Sturges that we give this week—he so made play in the straight run-in that the grey was proclaimed the winner. MILFORD HAVEN AND PEMBROKE DOCK.

Their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, on Saturday last, visited Pembroke and Milford Haven, coming by sea down the Bristol Channel on board H.M.S. Lively, which lay the day before off Minehead, on the Somersetshire coast. The Duke, accompanied by Sir E. J. Reed, M.P., landed at Milford and inspected the new docks there under construction, which were shown to his Royal Highness by Mr. Francis, Chairman of the Milford Town Commissioners, aided by Mr. Samuel Lake, the contractor, and by J. M. Toler, the engineer of these important works. The Enchantress, Admiralty yacht, with two Lords of the Admiralty, Lord John Hay, and Sir Thomas Brassey, M.P., joined company with the Lively, which conveyed their Royal Highnesses up Milford Haven to Pembroke Dock. They landed at the dockyard, between eleven and twelve, when two carriages, with an escort of yeomanry cavalry, took the Royal party and the official personages to Pembroke town, giving them a fine view of the ruined old Castle, where King Henry VII. was born. The streets of Pembroke were gaily decorated, the bells were ringing, the Volunteer bands playing, and the people cheering to welcome their Royal visitors. They were met at the Castle, where a pavilion had been erected for their reception, by the Mayor, Alderman Robert George, Lord Kensington, Lord Lieutenant of the county, and other persons of local and official position. An address was presented, after which the Very Rev. Dean Allen, of St. David’s, briefly directed the attention of their Royal Highnesses to the antiquities of Pembroke Castle. At two o’clock, they were again at the dockyard, to witness the launch of H.M.S. Edinburgh, a new ship of war, named at first H.M.S. Majestic. The Chief Constructor, Mr. C. E. Warren, showed the ship to their Royal Highnesses, and explained to the Duchess of Edinburgh how to use the lever by which she was to set the launching apparatus in motion. This was done with perfect success, after the reading of prayers by the Rev. Mr. Nicholls, dockyard chaplain; and the ship, which is a powerful ironclad, calculated to have a speed of fourteen knots an hour, and to carry four 43-ton breech-loading guns in turrets, with four lighter guns, passed into the water. The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh were entertained in the afternoon by the Superintendent of the Dockyard, Captain G. H. Parkin, and Mrs. Parkin. They proceeded next day, in the Lively, to Haverfordwest and St. David’s.

Milford Haven, of which we give some illustrations, is a fine, land-locked piece of deep water, ten miles long from west to east, and with several interior creeks or estuaries, that of Pembroke Dock being the most easterly and farthest inland. It has been said that Milford Haven itself is the best natural harbour of Great Britain, in respect of capacity and depth, complete shelter, and facility of entrance. Vessels seeking refuge in it need no pilot, but have only to pass the entrance, which from St. Ann’s Head to Rat Island off Blockhouse Point is of the width of a mile and six cables or furlongs, in order to ride out in safety on a good anchorage the heaviest south-westerly gales. The minimum depth of water at low water spring tides is eight fathoms, or forty-eight feet, so that even the Great Eastern at her maximum draught has eight feet to spare. The lower part of the harbour is protected by the Hubberton, Popton, Stack Rock, South Hook, Blockhouse, and Thorn Island forts, all armed with heavy guns. The new docks at Milford were designed by Sir E. J. Reed, formerly Chief Constructor of the Navy, specially for the accommodation of vessels of the largest tonnage, such as ironclads and the new mail steamers to America. The dimensions of the new docks are as follow:—Total available dock area, 60 acres; lock, 500 feet long by 70 feet wide; graving dock, which can also be used as a lock or wet dock, 710 feet long, 96 feet wide; small graving dock, 270 feet long, 46 feet wide; depth over sills, high water spring tides, 36 feet, and at high water neaps, 27 feet; depth of water in docks, 28 feet. The construction of these docks was undertaken some few years ago by a private company, with a capital of £530,000, and the contract was taken over in the year 1879 by Messrs. S. Lake and Co., of Victoria-street. The entire town of Milford, as well as the small town of Hakin, originally belonged to Colonel Greville, and became the property of the National Provident Institution, who have it leased for 999 years to the present owners. The property includes, besides these two towns, the foreshore for a mile and a half, and all the market rights and those of levying tolls on passing vessels. The estate extends over about 600 acres. The docks have been constructed by closing by a wharf wall and caissons a creek or “pill,” to use the local word, that runs into the Haven, and then dredging out the enclosed area to a suitable depth. The entrance to the docks is by two distinct locks, so that it will be possible to put a vessel into dry dock immediately on her coming from sea. Both ends of the lock proper and the haven end of the great graving dock are closed by caissons, the novel working arrangements of which were designed by the contractor, while the end of the graving dock opening into the wet dock is shut by an ordinary floating caisson. The weights of the caissons of the graving dock, the larger of which is stated to be the largest in the world, are, respectively, 400 tons and 300 tons, and those for the lock are about 250 tons each. They are built of Dowlais iron. The docks run north and south, and the total length of the quays up to the bridge across the creek at the north end is 2233 yards. At the entrances to the docks breakwater piers are built of concrete 24 ft. thick, on the principle patented by Messrs. Lake. A railway of the length of a mile and a half has been constructed along the foreshore from the present Milford station of the Great Western Railway to the end of a passenger pier running 700 ft. into the haven, so that trains may run alongside the mail-steamers, and passengers may dispense with the service of tenders. This pier has four lines of rail, and possesses every appliance for coaling vessels.

VIEWS OF THE RIVIERA.

That part of the Mediterranean coast lying west of Mentone, where the Queen and Princess Beatrice arrived on Thursday afternoon of last week to sojourn at the Chalet des Rosiers, Mr. C. Henfrey’s marine villa already described, offers many interesting points for a day’s excursion. Rocca-bruna, in French Roquebrune—for, be it remembered, all this piece of Italian seashore was transferred to French dominion by the treaty of 1860—is a village three or four miles from Mentone, situated amidst a grove of lemon-trees, upon a lofty rock of brown conglomerate, ascended by paved steps from the high road and the railway station, which lie 150 ft. below. On the upper summit are the ruins of an old castle, built in the Middle Ages by the Lascari of Ventimiglia, who in the year 1363 ceded it to Carlo Grimaldi. One of that princely family, in 1528, was a Bishop and Councillor of State to King Francis I. of France; and this political prelate repaired the Castle, a tower of which still displays his armorial bearings, with a mitre, sculptured on the stone lintel. The Marquis of Lorne’s romantic poem, “Guido and Lita,” the scene of which is laid at this place, contains the following lines:—

No warrior’s tread is echoed by these halls;
No warder’s challenge on the silence falls.
Around, the thrifty peasants ply their toil,
And pluck in orange groves the scented spoil
From trees, that have for purple mountains made
A vestment bright, of green and gold inlaid.

From Rocca-bruna, looking south-east, the bay of Monaco is overlooked, which is separated from the bay of Mentone by Cape Martin. On the near side of the little port of Monaco has arisen, since 1862, the fashionable modern town, called Monte Carlo, with fine terraces, ranges of stately mansions, grand hotels, and beautiful gardens, and with the too-celebrated Casino, a public gambling-house of European notoriety. The small Monaco territory belonged during eight centuries to the Grimaldi family. It is said that our London favourite, “Joey Grimaldi,” the most famous of theatrical clowns, was a scion of that noble house; but there were other Italian Grimaldis, of whom, in the seventeenth century, one was an eminent philosopher, one a Bolognese painter. The Monaco Grimaldis acquired their maritime principality by helping the Court of Provence to fight the Saracens; and they finally sold it to the late Emperor Napoleon III. On a rocky promontory, with precipitous cliffs, 200 ft. above the sea, the old town is built, with the palace on the landward side, having adjacent gardens sloping to the lower ground. There are about five thousand inhabitants at Monaco, and many hotels and boarding-houses; the palace is handsome, in the Italian style, and has witnessed some romantic historical events. Here, in 1523, one of its lords, who had murdered his brother, was himself put to death by his nephew; and here, eighty years later, Duke Hercules was hurled from the cliff by the enraged insurgent townsmen. An hour’s walk or drive, through the little territory of the Princes of Monaco, upon the Alpine road of the Corniche, conducts the tourist to the ancient Roman tower of Turbia, erected by Augustus Cæsar, which marks the frontier of yore between Italy and Gaul. Her Majesty will not lack the enjoyment of much picturesque scenery, with many interesting associations, during her four weeks’ stay at Mentone.

SKETCHES OF MODERN EGYPT.

Our Special Artist has been sent to portray the actual condition, manners, and habits of the population of Egypt at this day, upon account of the grave political anxieties that have lately arisen from the dubious position of the Khedive’s Government, and the conflict between the Anglo-French administrative or financial Control, and the Nationalist party led by Arabi Bey, now Prime Minister of Egypt. We do not intend here to enter upon that political discussion, still less to predict or conjecture the probable events that may be witnessed in Egypt before the end of this year, for which, it is to be hoped, our statesmen responsible for the guardianship of British interests, especially with regard to the Suez Canal, will be fully prepared when the critical moment shall arrive. It is our purpose just now, in connection with the first of this series of Sketches, briefly to speak of the outward aspects of the country, and its various races and classes of inhabitants, as delineated by our Artist, M. Montbard, in the illustrations we are beginning to publish.

Egypt, properly so called, is merely the Delta of the Nile and a narrow strip of land along the banks of that river, as far up as the First Cataract, which is 730 miles from the Mediterranean. The Delta, or broad plain below Cairo intersected by several branching outlets of the Nile, with canals and lakes between them, extends from Alexandria, the western seaport, to Port Said, the eastern, having the maritime towns of Rosetta and Damietta on its coast, situated at their respective mouths of the Nile, and the inland towns of Demenhur, Kebireh, Tanta and Mansurah, besides Zagazig, on the fresh-water canal, and Ismailia, on the Suez Canal. This plain, as everybody has heard, is one of the most fertile agricultural districts in the world, being yearly enriched with a deposit of precious mud from the Nile inundation, and enjoying the sunniest and most genial climate. The native peasantry, or Fellahs as they are called, dwell in mud-built villages, surrounded by palm-trees, on mounds of rising ground which seem to have been formed by the remains of ancient ruined cities from the time of the Pharaohs. They are miserably poor, having, till within the last five or six years, been most unjustly and cruelly treated by the Egyptian Government, not only with oppressive taxation, but with compulsory tasks of unpaid labour for the Khedive’s private gain, and with an utter denial of legal protection. The intervention of the British and French Governments, and the deposition of the late Khedive, Ismail Pasha, in June, 1879, have been followed by a great improvement in the condition of these unhappy people; but there is still need of further reforms, more particularly in the ordinary administration of the civil and criminal law. It should be observed that the Fellahs, or “diggers,” are a different race from the Mohammedan rulers of Egypt; they are supposed to be descendants of the ancient Egyptian nation. They number, altogether, about four millions, while the other inhabitants of Egypt are one million and a half, including Arabs, Copts, Syrians, Turks, and Europeans, with Nubians and some negroes from the Upper Nile.

There are but two large cities, Alexandria, with 212,000 population, and Cairo, with 350,000; in these cities, reckoning them together, 80,000 Europeans are to be found, and their social aspect is half Oriental, half French or foreign. Alexandria, founded by the famous Macedonian conqueror, above three centuries before the Christian era, was, under the Greeks and the Romans, one of the greatest cities of the old world, not only by its wealth and magnificence, but through its intellectual influence, which continued in after ages to affect both the Mohammedan and the Christian branches of progressive civilisation. Indirectly, no doubt, through the Arabian, Moorish, and Byzantine schools of learning, its light of stored-up knowledge was transmitted to Southern and Western Europe; and its claim, next to Athens and Rome, upon the grateful regard of humanity, is what no scholar will deny. In these days, it is merely a busy commercial port, with few tokens of antiquity properly belonging to it, the obelisks, one of which is now in London, having been conveyed to Alexandria from their original position far up the Nile. There are no remains of the superb Grecian buildings at Alexandria; the existing city dates from the reign of Mahomet Ali Pasha, great-grandfather of the present Khedive. The western harbour, furnished by English engineers and contractors with a breakwater, pier, quays, and lighthouses of the best design and construction, affords ample shipping accommodation, while the eastern harbour is almost silted up by the drifting mud carried that way along the low-lying shore. The Mahmoudieh canal, fifty miles long, connects Alexandria with the Rosetta branch of the Nile, but is now used only for the conveyance of produce. The traveller goes by railway to Cairo, once or twice crossing the Nile, afterwards keeping alongside of the high road; and it was among his native fellow-passengers in the interior of a third-class carriage upon this line, as well as looking out upon those whom he saw by the roadside, that our Special Artist drew most of the figures shown in our engravings this week. The distance is 162 miles, which usually occupies five or six hours, across a perfectly flat country of the richest alluvial soil, displaying the brightest verdure in the early spring season, with fields of rice, corn, maize, and clover, plantations of cotton and sugar-cane, luxuriant enough to satisfy the mind of the most anxious bondholder, if Egypt were safe under an honest administration.

The page of Character Sketches in our Supplement presents some examples of the piquant novelties and contrasts introduced by the railway system among an Eastern population. The railway officials, the station-master and the policeman in uniform, are dressed in European attire, except the “fez” or small tasseled cap, which every Moslem wears, instead of a hat like ours, to show that he is not a Christian. But the inferior class of railway servants, the pointsman or shunter who contrives to nurse his baby while doing duty on the line, and the day and night signal-men, the one with his flag, the other with a lantern perched on his head, are thoroughly Oriental figures. Those of the Bedouins, the graceful women selling bread, fruit, or water, the poor “fellah” beggar, the eunuch, and the Berber or “Barbarin,” require no further comment. We shall have plenty of additional illustrations of Life in Modern Egypt.

THE INSURRECTION IN HERZEGOVINA.

Although, as we stated last week, the Austrian Government has dealt a severe blow to the insurrection in the Crivoscie, and the troops are in full possession of all the important positions previously held by the insurgents, the latter do not seem to have ceased to resist. Out of sight and reach in the wild rock country which rises on one side towards the Herzegovina, and on the other towards Montenegro, they are on the alert; and seem disposed to carry on a guerrilla warfare against small detachments and exposed posts. On the very day after the capture of Dragalj the rearguard of a battalion and two detached companies which had been encamped near the frontier towards Grahovo, and which were marching back to take up a position near the coast, was attacked close to the Montenegrin frontier by a body of insurgents. The rearguard faced round and maintained its position until the main body came up, when the insurgents were beaten back. A battery placed at Klavici rendered good assistance to the troops. On the 11th inst., according to the official report, the insurgents attacked the 24th Battalion of Jagers at Jagvodak. Assistance was sent, and the insurgents were driven back with the loss of fifty men. They left their dead on the field. It is believed the troops had two killed and three severely wounded, among them an officer. On the same day the 10th battalion of the Tyrolese Jagers was attacked at Perkovac; here the insurgents were driven back with a loss of five wounded to the troops. The further course of things can alone show the real meaning and importance of this sudden fit of activity on the part of the insurgents the very day after their defeat, when they showed so little disposition to make a determined resistance—whether these partial attacks are but the isolated efforts of bands that have been dispersed in various directions and are seeking to join their companions, or whether the insurgents, having recovered from their surprise, mean now to adopt a system of guerrilla warfare on a smaller scale. It would be too much to expect that with the military occupation of the Crivoscie all further resistance on the part of the insurgents should cease, and the configuration of the country and the neighbourhood of the Montenegrin frontier afford great facilities for such a guerrilla warfare. The attempts just referred to having been made the day after the defeat, there would hardly seem to have been time for anything like combination. Some of these attacks look rather more like the isolated efforts of bands cut off from the main body. The insurgents held out longest in the rocky defile of Lupoglava, where a number of mines had been laid, which were blown up on the approach of the troops. When, however, the other column reached Dragalj the position became untenable, as it could be taken in the rear. To the system of combined movements is owing, no doubt, the rapidity of the success and the small list of losses. The troops had some hard work to do, for the outflanking columns made forced marches over pathless rocks and over snow and ice fields which were considered inaccessible. The marches are considered to be extraordinary performances; thus the battalions of the Kober division, which had to pass the heights of the Orienska Lovka, marched sixteen hours in snow several feet deep. The effort enabled them to reach the eastern slopes of this mountain and appear suddenly on the flank of the insurgents holding the defile of Brazan-Han. Over the Orienska Lovka and the steep rocky ridge of the Vela Greda, the troops had often to pass singly and then to slide down ice fields. The days were fine, but the troops suffered a great deal at night from the intense cold.

Our illustration shows the officer of Austrian Gendarmes at a guard-house receiving an insurgent prisoner brought in by a picket party of Tyrolean Jägers who have captured him on the mountain side.

DAISIES AND DAFFODILS.

March is the month for daisies and daffodils; and the coupling together of these flowers of spring points to an olden custom amongst country people—that of twining both of them as wreaths for the head. Herrick marks this custom, where he speaks of young men and maidens “tripping the comely country round, with daffodils and daisies crowned;” and Spenser, too, denotes it, where he describes a nymph gathering “sweet daffadillies” to make “gay girlonds;” as does Ben Jonson—“and tell the daffodils against that day that we prepare new garlands.” Drayton, too, says, in his directions for a garland, “See that there be stores of lilies, called of shepherds, daffadillies;” and by Spenser, and other early writers, this term of “lily” is also used. With the coming of the daffodil, as Shakespeare tells us, comes the pleasant promise of far brighter days—“when daffodils begin to peer, then comes in the sweet o’ the year;” and their time of growth he thus further specifies—“that come before the swallow dares, and take the winds of March with beauty;” and it is when those winds are strong enough to buffet the lambs, and blow the rooks about, that, in low-lying orchards, and in cottage crofts, we first shall find them.

Daffodils, as we are told, are allied to the narcissus; hence, Milton has this line on them—“and daffodillies fill their cups with tears;” and the fable of Narcissus—which is alluded to in the verse of Parnell, Leyden, Gay, Keats, and others—is thus by Ben Jonson aptly indicated—“since nature’s pride is now a withered daffodil.” Another name for the flower—as pointing to the time when it becomes so plentiful—is “Lent-lily;” and, though some think it a modern one, a very old term it is, as we find by Hurd’s using it. “Lily of Lent, with diadem superb, the monarch Daffodil uprears his head.” The “nodding daffodil” is an apt term, too, as applied to the way they nod, when Lent brings brisker winds; and Wordsworth speaks of them as “fluttering and dancing in the breeze;” and this pretty flutter of the fair Lent lilies is one of the charms of this breezy month. It is in this month, too, that children flock “to gather kingcups in the yellow mead, and prick their hair with daisies,” for it is then, when the fields are green with the springing grass, that daisies deck the pastures—deck them by day, to leave them green at night. “Observe how dewy twilight has withdrawn the crowd of daisies from the shaven lawn;” and the nightly “sleep” of this simple flower—“the little daisie that at evening closes”—which is so apparent to dwellers in country districts, has been marked by many writers. “Shut not so soon,” says Herrick, “the dulle-eyed night has not as yet begun;” and other poets, too, refer to it.

A pretty name for the daisy—though usually given to the larger, or ox-eyed kind—is “Marguerite;” and, as a pearl amongst flowers, it was dedicated to St. Margaret of Cortona, and it was also the badge of Margaret of Anjou. “Who,” says Drayton, “doth not delight to wear the daisy for Queen Marguerite?” and, in another passage, where he describes her in her reverse of fortune, he has these lines: “My daisy flower, which erst perfumed the air, which, for my favour, princes deigned to wear, now in the dust lies trodden on the ground.” Those were the days of which Leyden thus wrote: “When on his scarf the knight the daisy bound, and dames at tournaments shone with daisies crown’d.” So far from being of French derivation, the name Marguerite is derived from a Latin word, meaning “pearl;” and the term is a very old one. Thus, Chaucer uses it in his “Testament of Love”—“a margarite perle,” the “margarite of margarites,” the pearl of pearls; and again, “O commendable flowre, and most in minde, O amiable margarite of native kind;” and, in Wycliff’s translation, we find this line, “neither caste ye your margarites before swyn.” Than the wild and common daisy, few flowers have been more noticed by the poets—“flower by all beloved, and famous in song;” and the pleasant lore connected with it would alone suffice for a lengthy article. Children, as we know, love daisies; and mothers fondly place them in their coffins, and lay them on their graves. “Yes,” says Elliott, “lay the daisy’s little head beside the little cheek;” and there is one special day in the year—Palm Sunday—when, newly decked with daisies, tiny mounds show where the young are sleeping.

Yesterday week the Mayor of Manchester opened in that city the exhibition of smoke-condensing appliances, which will continue for a month.

Sir E. Watkin spoke very hopefully and confidently of the success of the Channel Tunnel at a meeting of the Submarine Continental Railway Company on the 16th inst. There had been no check to the boring operations; they were working “in the dry,” and he believed they would continue to do so.

ROYAL INSTITUTION LECTURES.

MECHANISM OF THE EYE AND EAR.

Professor McKendrick, in his ninth lecture, given on Tuesday, the 14th inst., resumed his illustrated explanations of colour sensations by pointing out that there are three primary sensations—red, green, and violet, but that we have no evidence of any distinct retinal elements corresponding to these. Other sensations of colour, such as those of yellow, orange, blue, &c., were, according to the theory of Young, adopted by Helmholtz, combinations of these three primary sensations, as shown by experiments with portions of the spectrum, and by rotating disks. The Professor next exhibited the effects due to the contrasts of colours, showing how one colour is affected by another. Green on a red ground appeared greenish blue; and grey on a green ground, pink. He suggested irradiation as a possible explanation, premising, however, that the irradiation might occur either in the brain or in the retina, or in both. He then illustrated, by means of interesting models, designed by Dr. Allen Thomson, the movements of the eyeballs, showing their various axes of rotation, planes, &c.; and indicated what is understood by Listing’s law. He then passed on to the sense of hearing, illustrating, in the first place, the movements of the drum by means of a preparation of the drum of a cat’s ear, which he converted into a manometric gas-capsule, similar to those devised by König. Finally, the Professor produced and explained some of the fundamental properties of sound, employing for the purpose the Syren tuning-forks, of very high pitch, and by Appunn’s apparatus of tongued pipes. He also showed the striking difference of the major chord in the lower and higher reaches of the scale, and concluded by demonstrating the range of the human ear, in regard to the appreciation of the pitch of musical notes.

RESEMBLANCES OF LIGHT AND SOUND.

Professor Tyndall gave the first of a course of three lectures on Thursday, the 16th instant. He began by remarking how naturally men, passing from admiration of the phenomena of nature, are led to study their causes, and how, impelled by imagination, they form hypotheses, to be tested by experiment. After reflecting on a screen an image of the waves formed on the surface of water by drops, he explained the undulatory theory of light, enunciated by Huyghens, and substantiated by Dr. Thomas Young, and the opposing emission theory put forth by Newton. The former, now generally accepted, supposes waves of ether to act on the retina; the latter supposes that particles of light impinge on the retina. The Professor then by models illustrated the way in which the pulsations of sound are transmitted by waves of air. The phenomena of reflection and refraction of both light and sound were then demonstrated by a series of experiments, reference being made to the rival theories of Newton and Huyghens. It was shown by casting a beam of light on a plate of glass, that part is reflected and part transmitted. The action of the waves of sound upon the sensitive flame of a gas-burner, under pressure just at the point of causing it to flare, was beautifully shown. The movements of the flame varied with the pitch and quality of the sound. The simultaneous reflection of light and sound was well shown by mirrors. This was followed by exhibiting the action of lenses on both light and sound with similar results. For sound, glass lenses were replaced by soap-bubbles filled with nitrous oxide and hydrogen gas. In conclusion, the persistence of impressions on the ear and the eye were well illustrated, the latter by Mr. Muybridge’s ingenious apparatus, termed the zoopraxiscope. The shadows of light and sound were also noticed.

SPECTROSCOPIC WORK WITH THE INFRA-RED (DARK) RAYS OF THE SPECTRUM.

Captain Abney, R.E., F.R.S., who gave the discourse at the weekly evening meeting on Friday, the 17th inst., began by comparing the use of the thermopile with the photographic method of measuring energy, and showed that the latter is based on the fact that energy, during any portion of time, has its effect, which is not the case with the thermopile. Ordinary photographic compounds were described as unsuitable for this special purpose, as they absorb the blue, and not the red or ultra-red, rays of the spectrum. Where there is absorption, there work must be done, and nowhere else. The lecturer then showed the method of producing a green film of bromide of silver, and exhibited its absorption in the red and ultra-red. He next demonstrated this last absorption by photographing electric light through ebonite, a comparatively slow process; and also showed how a rotating disk can be photographed by the light of the electric spark in a few millionths of a second by blue light. Photographs of the solar spectrum in the infra-red were shown, with their absorption lines. Captain Abney then proceeded to consider the absorption of colourless liquids (water, alcohol, &c.) in the infra-red region, and showed that everyone possessing a hydrogen atom also possessed special absorptive power, and that the hydrogen is really the framework on which all absorption is based. The existence of hydro-carbons in the spectrum was then indicated by showing that both ethylene and benzene have their principal lines coincident with Fraunhofer’s lines in the infra-red of the solar spectrum. Observations were then made on facts showing that Professor Tyndall’s method and the photographic method give similar results in regard to the power of absorption. In a series of successful experiments Captain Abney embodied the results of the patient researches of several years.

ORIGIN OF VOLCANOES.

Professor H. G. Seeley, F.R.S., of King’s College, gave the first of a course of three lectures on Saturday last, the 18th inst. He stated that the distinctive facts of a volcanic eruption which demand explanation are the heat of the rocks, the source of the eruptive power, and the nature of the materials which are ejected from the volcanic throat. He rejected the hypothesis of original igneous fusion, and accepted the hypothesis of a solid earth, which had become gradually built up by the infalling of meteoric matter. This earth was supposed to be gradually radiating its heat, and, in consequence, contraction of the crust takes place, which produces upheaval of mountains and continents. As the rocks approach the mountains, they become altered. The alteration is not due to contact with injected heated rock, but to pressure transformed to heat in an axis of upheaval. And in sequence the rocks are changed from clay to crypto-crystalline slate, micro-crystalline schists, and macro-crystalline rocks, in harmony with the intensity of the heat developed. When the igneous rocks thus formed become liquefied and are emitted through cracks so as to cool at the earth’s surface, they become volcanic rocks. Granite and gabbro coves still remain in the throats of extinct volcanoes. The positions of volcanoes in lines over the earth show that fissure eruptions were of the same nature as volcanoes, and their nearness to the sea was ultimately connected with the action of heat on infiltrating water, so as to produce explosive power. As the water becomes exhausted, or its source removed by upheaval, so the volcano intermits its eruption or becomes extinct. The materials ejected, however, were the best evidence of the nature of the earth’s interior, for their existence must be harmonised with the geological changes induced in the rocks by pressure.

TWO NOVELS.

Pleasant titles frequently attract readers, and are said to be considered by publishers more important than even the text, so that Gehenna: by the Hon. Lewis Wingfield (Hurst and Blackett) may or may not turn out to contain in the titular word, which is hardly so “blessed” as Mesopotamia, a something irresistibly attractive to the multitude. The sub-title, which is “Havens of Unrest,” is calculated to confirm such apprehensions of something dreadful as may be excited by the title proper. And yet there is nothing very horrible from one end of the novel to the other. The author appears to have written his book with a purpose; and that purpose seems to have been suggested to him by what he knows or has read about the application of the laws relating to lunatics and about the treatment to which real or supposed lunatics are subjected in private asylums. He may be considered, in fact, to have undertaken the task of showing up the manner in which a medical certificate may be obtained by anybody who desires to have somebody else confined in a madhouse, and of exposing the system of management employed in such a place. He has not been inspired, therefore, with any very novel idea; and what he proposed to himself to do has already been very much better done by Mr. Charles Rendle, among others, as most readers of novels must remember. At the same time, the author of “Gehenna” must be admitted to have written a very powerful tale, readable throughout and highly interesting, as well as trenchant in parts, though his originality is displayed rather in the treatment than in the choice of his subject, and though that treatment cannot be commended on the score of artistic skill and natural development. For, when an author wishes to expose and to cure a certain state of things, it is surely a mistake in art, if the sympathies of the public are to be enlisted, to present a series of characters, incidents, and situations, of which it is not too much to say that every one, or nearly every one, of them is exceptional. A skilful artist would, on the contrary, strive to draw such a picture as should produce conviction by the absence of everything extraordinary in the details, though the result might be as startling and marvellous as a nightmare. A baronet with thirty thousand a year may, of course, conceive an invincible antipathy towards all Scotchwomen, and may, of course, have three sons, each more or less afflicted with a “bee in the bonnet” or with some weakness; a beautiful, unscrupulous adventuress may, of course, enlist in her service, by the power of her charms, all kinds of susceptible men, including an old dotard subject to temporary insanity and a ticket-of-leave man given to whisky; a private asylum may, of course, be managed by two doctors, of whom one is a dreamer and the other a drunkard, with a convicted felon, of brutal propensities, for their principal assistant; a penniless, practiceless young doctor may, of course, be induced by the representations of a cynical, much older, and more experienced practitioner to do violence to his feelings and yield his unwilling signature under pressure of his professional senior;—and all these personages may, of course, be brought into close communication one with another, in which case some diabolical deed or deeds may, of course, be perpetrated to the damage of real or supposed lunatics; but so strange a combination can hardly be regarded as a fair example of the cases with which the lunacy laws can be expected to cope. This consideration, however, has little or nothing to do with the romantic aspect of the story, which, from that point of view, is both interesting and exciting, if the conclusion should be regarded as unsatisfactory. The young doctor, for instance, from whose study of insanity the reader is likely at one part of the narrative to anticipate great things, does not seem to have made any notable physiological or other discoveries.

Emotions of various kinds and the almost poetical thoughts, as well as the impulsive actions, of a “gifted being” are depicted in The Garden of Eden (Richard Bentley and Son), by an anonymous author, whose fervid language drops apparently without effort from the pen, and whose unlagging vehemence of style hurries the reader irresistibly along. The title is so far justified that the opening scene is laid in a garden, where the heroine lies swinging in a hammock, and in that garden, as the story progresses, there is more than one vision of bliss, more than one situation suggestive of Paradise lost. A perfectly innocent vision, be it understood, and a perfectly decorous situation; for, though there is passion enough and to spare, there is nothing of a “leafless” character throughout the novel. The heroine is a genius, a born songstress, a Jenny Lind, or a Patti, or a Nilsson; who can captivate an old baronet with a simple ballad, or a professional teacher of singing with a piece of Handel or Haydn, or a fashionable Parisian audience (believe it who may) with a hymn, or an impresario with “the agonies of Beethoven’s Leonora,” or an English nobleman’s nephew and heir with her splendid voice, her lovely person, her confident and confidential ways, or her faithful playmate, friend, henchman, and affianced husband, plain Jack Manners, with the tip of her little finger. She is quite unconventional, so unconventional, in fact, that she might have been expected to come to a miserable end, the miserable end which generally awaits (in novels) the lovely and gifted heroine, who, treating her ugly but constant and honest Jack like a dog, falls desperately in love with the wicked nobleman, the “lady-killer.” Indeed, she dreams a dream which renders it extremely probable that the author in the first instance intended her to incur the usual sad fate, but thought better of it, or was wisely advised to reject so hackneyed and questionable a catastrophe; unless the author purposely introduced, as a joke without much point, an illustration of the proverb concerning dreams and their contraries. The story resolves itself into a sketch of the life led and the hopes cherished by a perfect child of nature, a young girl who sings her way to a coronet; and in the course of the sketch there are several clever descriptions of the trials as well as of the triumphs which, especially in matters of social intercourse, await the professional singer, besides several satirical delineations of professional people themselves. What particular charm there was about the nobleman who marries the heroine, beyond his reputation as a “lady-killer,” the ladies who read the novel may, perhaps, discover; the majority of men-readers, it may be safely asserted, will be utterly unable to account for the heroine’s fascination, and will think that, but for the coronet, she would have been better off with poor Jack. The conclusion, too, has a suspicion of lameness about it; for the heroine’s successful appearance in public was by no means necessary, so far as one can see, for the completion of the main business; and it occurs to one that a pleasanter, a more probable, and a less melodramatic ending might have been brought about by other means. As for the behaviour of the girl’s parents and of the other personages who left her, as it were, in Clifford’s hands, readers must decide for themselves how far it is in accordance with the practice of the most eccentric fathers and mothers, patrons and patronesses, to say nothing of a girl’s own instincts.

The proceeds of the annual fancy-dress ball recently held in aid of the Brighton charities were £190.

OBITUARY.

THE DOWAGER LADY LYTTON.

The Right Honourable Rosina Doyle, Dowager Lady Lytton, widow of the eminent novelist, Edward Bulwer Lytton, afterwards Lord Lytton, died on the 12th inst., at her residence, Upper Sydenham, aged seventy-eight. Her Ladyship, who was the only daughter of Mr. Francis Massy Wheeler, of Lizzard Connell, county Limerick, grandson maternally of the first Lord Massy, married, Aug. 29, 1827, Edward George Earle Lytton Bulwer, of Knebworth Park, Herts, who was created a Baronet in 1838, and a Peer, as Lord Lytton, in 1866, and had one daughter, Emily Elizabeth, who died in 1848, and one son, the present Earl of Lytton, G.C.B., the late Governor-General of India. Lady Lytton entered the literary arena as authoress of "Cheveley; or, the Man of Honour," and subsequently published several other works of fiction, among others, "The Budget of the Babbie Family," "Behind the Scenes," "The Peer's Daughters," "The World and his Wife," "Miriam," and "Sedley; or, the Tares and the Wheat."

SIR JAMES BOURNE, BART.

Sir James Bourne, Bart., of Heathfield House, Wavertree, Liverpool, and Hackinsall, Fleetwood, in the county of Lancaster, C.B., F.S.A., J.P. and D.L., died at Heathfield on the 14th inst. He was born on Oct. 8, 1812, the second son of Mr. Peter Bourne, of Liverpool, and afterwards of Hackinsall, by Margaret, his wife, only daughter of Mr. James Drinkwater, of Liverpool. For a long time he was connected with the volunteer force, and was at the period of his decease Hon. Colonel of the Royal Lancashire Artillery Militia. From 1865 to 1880 he sat in Parliament as a Conservative for Evesham (having previously, in 1841, unsuccessfully contested the borough of Wexford), and was created a Baronet May 10, 1880. Sir James married, Oct. 13, 1841, Sarah Harriet, daughter of Mr. Thomas Fournis Dyson, of Everton, Lancashire, and of Willow Hall, Yorkshire; and leaves one daughter, Harriet Anne Dyson, and one son, his successor, now Sir James Dyson Bourne, second Baronet, Lieutenant-Colonel 5th Dragoon Guards, who was born July 29, 1842, and married, Dec. 29, 1875, Lady Marion, only daughter of John Henry, third Marquis of Ely.

CAPTAIN HANS BUSK.

Captain Hans Busk, F.R.G.S., D.C.L., LL.D., of Nantmel, Radnorshire, the strenuous advocate and one of the chief originators of the Volunteer system, died on the 11th inst. at his residence in Ashley-place. He was the eldest son of Mr. Hans Busk, of Glenalder, in Radnorshire, and received his education at King's College, London, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, whence he was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in 1841. He was a magistrate for Middlesex and a Deputy Lieutenant for Radnorshire. From early life Captain Busk zealously promoted the idea, subsequently so effectually carried into effect, of the formation of rifle volunteer corps, and he was author of several works relative to drilling and the use of the rifle, besides some on other subjects. He founded and for a time edited the New Quarterly Review. A large sum subscribed in recognition of his services he most generously allocated to the purchase of a life-boat for Ryde. The founder in England of the Busk family was Jacob Hans Busch, a Swede, who was naturalised in 1722: his fifth son, Sir Wadsworth Busk, was grandfather of the gentleman whose death we record. A portrait of the late Captain Hans Busk appears in this Number of our Journal.

MR. GORDON-CUMING-SKENE.

Mr. John Gordon-Cuming-Skene, of Pitlurg and Dyce, county Aberdeen, J.P. and D.L., died on the 20th ult., at Villa Teresa, San Remo, aged fifty-five. He was eldest son of Lieut.-Colonel William Gordon-Cuming-Skene, of Pitlurg and Dyce, by Anne, his wife, daughter of Mr. Alexander Brebner, of Learney, and represented in the male line a very ancient branch of the noble House of Gordon, descended from John Gordon of Auchlenchries, who fell at the battle of Flodden. The names of Cuming and Skene were assumed in consequence of marriages with heiresses. Mr. Gordon-Cuming-Skene was educated at Eton, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, and succeeded his father in 1837. He married, first, March 27, 1856, Maria, daughter of Captain W. H. Nares, R.N.; and secondly, Jan. 5, 1860, Margaret Maria, only daughter of Sir David Brewster, K.H., and by the former, who died June 23, 1857, he leaves one son, Alexander, now of Pitlurg and Dyce.

We have also to record the deaths of—

Mr. William Henry Coussmaker, of Westwood, Surrey, on the 10th inst., at Wyke, near Guildford, in his forty-fifth year.

Mr. Edward Bowly, the eminent agriculturist and short-horn breeder, at his residence, Leddington House, Cirencester, on the 19th inst., at an advanced age, after a long illness.

The Hon. Charles Howard, brother of the present Earl of Effingham, on the 8th inst., at Tunbridge Wells, aged seventy-four.

The Rev. John Williams-Ellis, of Glasfryn, formerly Rector of Llanelhaiarn, J.P. and D.L. for the counties of Merioneth and Carnarvon, on the 13th inst., at Plas Lodwic, Bangor, aged seventy-four.

Mr. Francis Leigh, of Sion House, county Wexford, High Sheriff of that county in 1837, on the 20th ult. He was the youngest son of Mr. Francis Leigh, of Rosegarland, by Grace, his wife, daughter of Mr. Richard Baldwin.

Vice-Admiral George Stewart Reynolds, on the 15th inst., at Guildford, aged eighty. He entered the Royal Navy in 1814, was placed on the retired list in 1867, and became Vice-Admiral in 1879.

Miss Ada Trevanion, whose death was recorded in our Number for the 11th inst., was the daughter of Henry and Georgiana Augusta Trevanion, and granddaughter of Colonel and the Hon. Augusta Leigh, sister to the poet Lord Byron.

The Hon. Arthur Alexander Onalow, Member of the Legislative Council, New South Wales, on Jan. 30. He was born at Trichinopoly in 1833, entered the Royal Navy in 1847, and, after seeing some active service, retired in 1871. He was elected to the New South Wales Parliament for Camden in 1870, and subsequently was raised to the Legislative Council.

Mr. Henry Tilson Shaen Carter, late 17th Lancers, on the 9th inst., at Shaen Manor, Belmullet, county Mayo, on the 9th inst., aged thirty-six. He was eldest son of the late Mr. Thomas Shaen Carter, of Watlington Park, Oxon, and Erris, county Mayo, by Maria Susan, his wife, only surviving child and heiress of Colonel Tilson, of Watlington Park.

Admiral James Anderson, on the 7th inst., at Teignmouth, in his eighty-fifth year. He was eldest son of Mr. James Anderson, and brother to Sir William George Anderson, K.C.B., Auditor of the Duchy of Cornwall. He entered the Royal Navy in 1808, served in the expedition to New Orleans, in the taking of Washington, and the attack on Baltimore. He attained the rank of Admiral in 1878.

Lord George Francis Montagu, on the 12th inst., at Washington. He was son of George, sixth Duke of Manchester, by his second wife, Harriet Sydney, daughter of Mr. Conway R. Dobbs, of Castle Dobbs, in the county of Antrim, and was thus half-brother to the present Duke of Manchester, K.P. He was educated at the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, and was formerly Lieutenant in the Royal Artillery, from which he entered the diplomatic service, and became Third Secretary at Washington.

Dr. George Budd, F.R.S., at his residence, Ashleigh, Barnstaple, on the 14th inst., aged seventy-four. This eminent physician was for upwards of twenty years professor of medicine in King's College, and senior physician to King's College Hospital. He was a distinguished graduate of Cambridge, and a Fellow of Caius College. In 1841 he became a Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, and subsequently censor and member of the council of the college. Dr. Budd is best known as the author of a treatise on "Diseases of the Liver," a work which has gone through several editions.

Thus far, the game, although interesting, calls for no comment. Here, White chooses wisely in preferring the move in the text to 21. Kt to B 7th (ch), a move which would have ultimately cost him two Knights for the Rook.

A match between the Woolwich and Bermondsey clubs was played on Saturday last, seven players a side. Bermondsey won with a score of four to one.

The handicap tournament of the City of London Club has now arrived at a very interesting stage. Only eight competitors remain in the tourney, of the sixty-four that entered the lists last autumn—viz., Messrs. Blackburne, Macruski, Block, T. H. Piper, Laws, Ridpath, Down, and Taylor. There are six prizes provided in this contest, to be given in money or works of art, as may be preferred. The winner of the chief prize secures the further distinction of having his name inscribed on the "Morton Cup," a large silver goblet, which is to be placed on the table at all important festivals so long as the club shall endure.

Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar presented certificates to the Portsmouth classes of the St. John Ambulance Association yesterday week; Major F. Duncan, R.A., deputy-chairman of the association, also delivering an address. Certificates were presented to the Exeter classes on Saturday by the Earl of Devon. The work of this society has just received from abroad most gratifying testimony to its value.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated Aug. 13, 1880), with a codicil (dated Sept. 2 following), of Mr. Charles Pearce, late of Wilbury-road, Hove, and of Lindfield Place, Lindfield, Sussex, who died on the 10th ult., was proved on the 8th inst. by Thomas Gardner, Samuel Gardner, and Arthur Louis Alfred Hertlett, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £93,000. The testator gives £1000 each to the Home for Little Boys, Farnham, Kent; the Infant Orphan Asylum, Wanstead; the Hospital for Sick Children, Great Ormond-street; and the Royal Infirmary or Hospital for Women and Children, Waterloo-road;—£500 each to the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and the Home for Lost Dogs, Lower Wandsworth-road; his house in Wilbury-road, with the furniture and effects, and £12,000 upon trust for Mrs. Sophia Harding Burford for life, and afterwards as she shall appoint; his small freehold property at Salehurst to his brother Maresco; and legacies to his late wife's sisters and brother, to his cousins, executors, housekeeper, coachman, and household servants. The residue of his real and personal estate he divides equally between his brothers and sister, the Rev. William Peter Pearce, Maresco Pearce, and Mrs. Frances Mary Eastwood.

The will (dated June 28, 1881) of Mr. Daniel Bell Hanbury, late of Hollywood, Clapham-common, who died on the 12th ult., was proved on the 27th ult. by Sampson Hanbury and Thomas Hanbury, the sons, the executors, the value of the personal estate being nearly £87,000. There are various pecuniary and specific devises and bequests to his sons, Sampson, Thomas, Barclay, and Capel, to his daughter, Mrs. Anna Christy Aggs, and to his son-in-law, Mr. Aggs, and some reversionary gifts to grandchildren; and the residue of his property the testator leaves between his said five children.

The will (dated Sept. 14, 1880) of Mr. Edward Etches, late of The Grange, Litchurch, Derby, who died on Jan. 13 last, was proved on the 21st ult. by Mr. Edward Arthur Brownfield, the nephew and acting executor, the value of the personal estate amounting to nearly £47,000. The testator leaves to his executor one hundred guineas; to his wife, Mrs. Louisa Georgiana Etches, £300, his household furniture, plate, pictures, and effects, and £1000 per annum for life; his house, with the grounds, The Grange, he also leaves to his wife for life, and at her death to his son, Charles Edward. The residue of his real and personal estate is to be divided between all his children in equal shares.

The will (dated Dec. 24, 1879) of Mr. Thomas Francis Cobb, late of No. 11, Marine-terrace, Margate, who died on Jan. 24 last, was proved on the 24th ult. by James Francis Cobb and Anthony Blackburne Cobb, the sons, the executors, the value of the personal estate being over £42,000. The testator leaves an annuity of £300 to each of his three daughters, Rosellen Emma, Frances Elizabeth, and Mary Thomazine; and, in addition, his household furniture and effects and £450 per annum for their joint lives, or until marriage, with benefit of survivorship. All his real estate, and the residue of the personality, he gives to his two sons.

The will (dated Sept. 26, 1880), with a codicil (dated Nov. 1, 1881), of Mr. Charles Hodgson, late of Southend Elvet, near Durham, iron merchant, who died on Nov. 23 last, has been proved at the Durham district registry by Arthur Pattison, the acting executor, the value of the personal estate exceeding £38,000. The testator bequeaths £4000 to the Durham County Hospital;—£3000 each to the Royal Albert Asylum for Idiots and Imbeciles of the Northern Counties at Lancaster, and the Northern Counties Society for Granting Annuities to Governesses and other ladies in reduced circumstances;—£2500 each to the Royal Victoria Asylum for the Industrious Blind of the Counties of Northumberland, Durham, Cumberland, and Westmoreland, and the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, at Newcastle; and the Northern Counties Institution for the Education of the Deaf and Dumb;—£1000 each to the Convalescent Institution of the counties of Northumberland and Durham, and the Convalescent Home and Children's Hospital at Coatham, Redcar; £500 to the Durham Soup-Kitchen; £200 to the Durham Penitentiary; £100 each to the Schools in connection with St. Oswald's, St. Giles's, and St. Margaret's, Durham; and numerous legacies and annuities to relatives and others. The residue of his real and personal estate he gives to the five children of his brother, Thomas.

The will (dated April 19, 1877), with two codicils (dated Feb. 26 and June 18, 1881), of Mrs. Elizabeth Coke, late of Norfolk Lodge, Southborough, Kent, who died on Feb. 8 last, was proved on the 9th inst. by William Redfern and Henry Taylor, the nephews, the executors, the value of the personal estate exceeding £36,000. There are considerable legacies to or upon trust for her brother, nephews, nieces, and others, and the residue of the personality the testatrix divides between her nephews and nieces, Edward Ralph Redfern, Frederick William Redfern, Elizabeth Redfern, Elizabeth Ingham Bretland, and Ellen Banks Taylor.

The will (dated April 21, 1880) of Miss Fanny Du Pre, late of No. 9, York-gate, Regent's Park, who died on Jan. 17 last, was proved on the 28th ult. by Arthur Riversdale Grenfell, the nephew and acting executor, the value of the personal estate exceeding £31,000. The testatrix gives legacies to her sister Mrs. Thornton, and other relatives and to servants; all her remaining securities for money, stocks and funds, equally between her sisters, Gertrude, Louisa, and Julia; and she appoints her said sister Louisa sole residuary legatee.

The will (dated July 31, 1873), with a codicil (dated Oct. 31, 1881), of Sir Hugh Owen, late of Voel, Hornsey-lane, Hornsey, who died on Nov. 20 last at Mentone, was proved on the 24th ult. by Hugh Owen and William Owen, the sons, the executors, the personal estate being under £3000. The testator gives his household furniture to his granddaughter, Julia Squire; and the residue of his property between his sons and daughters and the children of his deceased daughter Mary Anne.

Six Scotch charitable institutions have received bequests in accordance with the terms of the will of Dr. Thomas Hunter, late Deputy-Inspector-General of Hospitals. The total sum bequeathed to these charities is £22,183, of which £13,500 has been received by the Royal Infirmary at Edinburgh.

The fourteenth annual show and sale of shorthorn cattle promoted by the local Agricultural Exhibition Society held in Bingley Hall, Birmingham, last week were the largest and best the association has yet held. The entries numbered 546, being considerably in excess of last year's exhibits. Among the exhibitors were the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Devonshire, the Earl of Bective, and other distinguished amateurs.

The Act 45 Vic., cap. 2, has been issued to authorise the use of reply post-cards. The highest rate for an inland post-card is not to exceed one halfpenny, and a reply post-card not to exceed double the rate of an ordinary post-card. A reply post-card means a card that the person receiving it through the post may transmit the same or a part through the post without further payment. The Act is now in operation.

A VISIT TO PEARS' SOAP WORKS.

THE interest displayed nowadays by the public in sanitation in every form, and the special attention lately given by the press to the subject of the injurious composition of many of the varied kinds of toilet soaps, induces one to think that some description of the manufacture of so important an article of daily consumption would not be without interest to the public. The artist who undertook to make this illustration applied to Messrs. A. and F. Pears, in London, as at once, perhaps, the oldest established and most eminent makers (they have been manufacturers since 1789) for permission to view their works. He received from them a very courteous introduction to their partner at Isleworth, where in a couple of days he derived much valuable information; but the very varied and extensive character of the processes of manufacture and its accompanying details will admit only of a very short summary at the present moment, owing to the limitation of space. On commencing his inspection of Messrs. Pears' large and interesting factories, he was shown vast stores of crude material—fresh, sweet tallows of English gathering only; the brightest and purest oils from Florence and Gallipoli; palm oil of violet odour, grown under "Africa's burning sun;" amber resins from America and France; large casks and iron drums of various chemicals in beautiful crystals, from the leading scientific laboratories of the North of England and from Germany; rare oils and musk in foreign-looking packages from the East, from India, China, and Ceylon; delicate essences of the sweetest flowers from the Italian Alps, and the precious attar of roses from the Balkan mountains and from Persia; and sandal-wood from Bombay and West Australia. Indeed, not only have contributions been levied from every land, but the sea itself has been brought under contribution to this manufacture in its salts, as well as in ambergris from the sperm whale.

The fats and oils having been selected in certain proportions are first intimately mixed by machinery driven by an enormous steam-engine; the requisite chemical ingredients then being added from time to time, the whole is subjected to several days' boiling and stirring in pans, each holding many tons, and supplied with steam by five immense boilers. This raw soap is transferred into smaller pans, where it is clarified and all impurities precipitated by a series of chemical processes, the inventions and patents of Messrs. Pears. The previously distilled and mixed perfumes are now added, and, whilst in a molten state, the product is poured into large frames and permitted to cool. It is then cut up and moulded into different shapes and sizes convenient for washing and shaving purposes; the name of the firm is then stamped on by hand machines. These pieces of soap are afterwards matured by being placed in heated chambers and turned daily for several months, when it is handed over to the cardboard box making and filling shops, in which female labour is largely employed, and thence to the warehouse and packing shops, whence it is distributed to Railways and Docks for carriage to every part of the civilised world. The importance of the Toilet Soap manufacture of Great Britain may be estimated from the fact that representatives of Messrs. Pears personally visit not only the chief towns of Great Britain, but those of almost every quarter of the globe. The reputation of Messrs. Pears is well known to the public. Their pure and excellently prepared manufactures are exhibited with great taste in the windows of most of our leading chemists, in beautifully-cut glass dishes and vases, and hence of the merits of their manufacture we need say but little. Probably the greatest compliment ever paid to a soap manufacturer they received from no less eminent an authority than Sir ERASMUS WILSON, F.R.S., who has specially written, in one of his works on the skin, "Pears, a name engraven on the memory of the oldest inhabitant, and Pears's transparent soap, one of the most refreshing and agreeable of balms to the skin." A valuable recommendation indeed for Messrs. Pears, but not less valuable to the public, for nothing is more important amongst our daily wants than a properly manufactured toilet soap; for whilst from the use of a good one our skins and complexions admittedly derive and maintain health and beauty and every possible advantage, nothing is more harmful than the common strongly alkaline and coloured preparations frequently met with under the name of toilet soap, as is testified by the experience of our dermatologists at the leading institutions for the skin, at one of which, it is affirmed by the senior surgeon, they have had about four hundred cases of skin trouble owing their origin to improper toilet soaps alone. It is amongst infant children, ladies, and those generally with a fine, sensitive skin, that the most injurious results are observed, and the causes appear to be in the cheap rancid fats used in the composition of the soap, or in the introduction of noxious chemicals for colouring or increasing detergent properties, and very frequently from the ignorant introduction of so-called "remedial agents."

As regards Messrs. Pears's Soap, there is no doubt of the purity of the fats used, for the tallow and oils appear to be good enough to eat; and, indeed, the manager gave evidence of this by tasting samples of the bulk in use. The care displayed in their subsequent manufacture must be seen to be appreciated; and certain it is and manifest to all that the completed article, so well known as Pears's Transparent Soap, is in appearance almost as tempting as candy or chocolate, and the makers may well claim for it, as they do, excellence for its purity, its fragrance, and its durability.

Messrs. Pears appear to be endowed with considerable originality, which is evinced as much in the tasteful printing accompanying their goods and in their advertisements as in their manufactures. The humorous placard so well known in London of the little "nigger" whose complexion has derived so much benefit from a trial of their famous soap is without doubt the best essay of the kind, no fewer than ten different lithographic stones being employed in its production. Again, the well-known statuette in plaster of "You Dirty Boy!" at the Paris Exhibition is a commission in the marble from Messrs. A. and F. Pears to the eminent sculptor Signor Focardi, at a cost of £500, simply as an attraction for their retail dépôt in London, next to the British Museum.

It may be observed that during the three generations—ninety years—that their Manufactory has been established they have received the highest and most distinctive patronage for their spécialité from most of the Royal Families in Europe, and they hold the distinguished position of appointed Soap-makers to H.R.H. the Prince of Wales. At Exhibitions they have been ever in the foremost rank, from and inclusive of the first, in 1851, down to the most recent in Australia.

For the writer to add any commendation to that of Sir Erasmus Wilson would be "to gild refined gold." It is to be regretted that the limited space here will not admit, either in description or illustration, of that amplification which is merited by so important and extensive a manufacture.

FLORILINE.For the TEETH and BREATH.

A few drops of the FRAGRANT FLORILINE on a wet toothbrush produces a delightful foam, which cleanses the Teeth from all impurities, strengthens and hardens the gums, prevents tartar and arrests the progress of decay. It gives to the Teeth a peculiar and beautiful whiteness, and imparts a delightful fragrance to the breath. It removes all unpleasant odour arising from decayed teeth, a disordered stomach, or tobacco smoke. The FRAGRANT FLORILINE is purely vegetable, and equally adapted to old and young.

The FRAGRANT FLORILINE should be used in all cases of bad breath, and particularly after smoking. The Floriline combines, in a concentrated form, the most delicate, cleansing, and astringent properties. At the same time, it contains nothing which can possibly injure the most sensitive and delicate organization.

It beautifies the teeth and gums.
It arrests the decay of the teeth.
It acts as a detergent after smoking.
It renders the gums hard and healthy.
It neutralizes the offensive secretions of the mouth.
It imparts to the breath a fragrance purely aromatic and pleasant.

Put up in large bottles (only one size) and in elegant toilet-cases, complete, at 2s. 6d. Sold by all Chemists and Perfumers. Sole Wholesale by the ANGLO-AMERICAN DRUG COMPANY, Limited, 33, Farringdon-road, London.

FLORILINE.For the TEETH and BREATH.

Sweet as the ambrosial air,
With its perfume rich and rare;
Sweet as violets at the morn,
Which the emerald nooks adorn;
Sweet as rosebuds bursting forth
From the richly-laden earth
Is the "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

The teeth it makes a pearly white,
So pure and lovely to the sight;
The gums assume a rosy hue,
The breath is sweet as violets blue;
While scented as the flowers of May,
Which cast their sweetness from each spray,
Is the "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

Sure, some fairy with its hand
Cast around its mystic wand,
And produced from fairy's bow
Scented perfumes from each flower;
For in this liquid gem we trace—
All that can beauty add and grace—
Such is the "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

FLORILINE.For the TEETH and BREATH.

Is the best liquid dentifrice in the world; it thoroughly cleanses partially decayed teeth from all parasites or living "animalcules," leaving them pearly white, imparting a delightful fragrance to the breath. Price 2s. 6d. per Bottle. The FRAGRANT FLORILINE removes instantly all odours arising from a foul stomach or tobacco-smoke.

For children and adults whose teeth show marks of decay its advantages are paramount. The Floriline should be used roughly brushed into all the cavities; no one needs fear using it too often or too much at a time. Among the ingredients being soda, honey, spirits of wine, borax, and extracts from sweet herbs and plants, it forms not only the very best dentifrice for cleansing and whitening, but one that is perfectly delicious to the taste and as harmless as sherry. The taste is so pleasing that, instead of taking up the toothbrush with dislike, as is often the case, children will on their own account omit to use the "Floriline" regularly each morning if only left to their own choice. Children cannot be taught the use of the toothbrush too young; early neglect invariably produces premature decay of the teeth. "Floriline" is sold by all Chemists and Perfumers throughout the world, at 2s. 6d. per Bottle.

FLORILINE.For the TEETH and BREATH.

If teeth are white and beautiful,
It keeps them so intact;
If they're discoloured in the least,
It brings their whiteness back;
And by its use what good effects
Are daily to be seen;
Thus hence it is that general praise
Greets "FRAGRANT FLORILINE!"

One trial proves conclusive quite,
That by its constant use
The very best effects arise
That science can produce.
It is the talk of every one,
An all-absorbing theme;
Whilst general now becomes the use
Of "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

It makes the breath as sweet as flowers,
The teeth a pearly white;
The gums it hardens, and it gives
A freshness of delight.
All vile secretions it removes,
However long they've been;
The enamel, too, it will preserve,
The "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

FLORILINE.For the TEETH and BREATH.

It may or may not be generally known that microscopic examinations have proved that animal or vegetable parasites gather, unobserved by the naked eye, upon the teeth and gums of at least nine persons in every ten; any individual may easily satisfy himself in this matter by placing a powerful microscope over a partially-decayed tooth, when the living animalcules will be found to resemble a partially-decayed cheese more than anything else we can compare it to. We may also state that the FRAGRANT FLORILINE is the only remedy yet discovered able perfectly to free the teeth and gums from these parasites without the slightest injury to the teeth or the most tender gums.

Read this.—From the "Weekly Times," March 26, 1891:—"There are so many toilet articles which obtain all their celebrity from being constantly and extensively advertised that it makes it necessary, when anything new and good is introduced to the public that special attention should be called to it. The most delightful and effective toilet article for cleansing and beautifying the teeth that we in a long experience have ever used is the new Fragrant Floriline. It is quite a pleasure to use it, and its properties of imparting a fragrance to the breath and giving a pearly whiteness to the teeth make it still more valuable. Of all the numerous nostrums for cleansing the teeth which from time to time have been fashionable and popular, nothing to be compared with the Floriline has hitherto been produced, whether considered as a beautifier or a valuable cleanser and preserver of the teeth and gums."

From the "Young Ladies' Journal":—"An agreeable dentifrice is always a luxury. As one of the most agreeable may be reckoned Floriline, it cleanses the teeth and imparts a pleasant odour to the breath. It has been analysed by several eminent professors of chemistry, and they concur in their testimony to its usefulness. We are frequently asked to recommend a dentifrice to our readers; therefore we cannot do better than advise them to try the Fragrant Floriline."

FLORILINE.For the TEETH and BREATH.

I have heard a strange statement, dear Fanny, to-day,
That the reason that teeth do decay
Is traced to some objects that form in the gums,
And eat them in time quite away.
Animalcules, they say, are engendered—that is,
If the mouth is not wholesome and clean;
And I also have heard to preserve them the best
Is the fragrant, the sweet "FLORILINE!"

Oh, yes! it is true that secretions will cause
Living objects to form on your teeth,
And certainly and silently do they gnaw on
In cavities made underneath;
But a certain preservative has now been found,
To keep your mouth wholesome and clean;
And you're perfectly right, for your teeth to preserve,
There's nothing like sweet "FLORILINE!"

It's nice and refreshing, and pleasant to use,
And no danger its use can attend;
For clever physicians and dentists as well
Their uniform praises now blend.
They say it's the best preparation that's known,
And evident proofs have they seen,
That nothing can equal the virtues that dwell
In the fragrant, the sweet "FLORILINE!"

FLORILINE.For the TEETH and BREATH.

The "Christian World" of March 17, 1891, says, with respect to Floriline:—"Floriline bids fair to become a household word in England, and one of peculiarly pleasant meaning. It would be difficult to conceive a more efficacious and agreeable preparation for the teeth. Those who once begin to use it will certainly never willingly give it up."

Mr. G. H. Jones, the eminent Dentist, of 57, Great Russell-street, in his valuable little book on Dentistry, says:—"The use of a good dentifrice is also indispensable, and one of the best preparations for cleansing the teeth and removing the impure secretions of the mouth is the liquid dentifrice called 'Fragrant Floriline,' which is sold by all respectable Chemists."

The words "Fragrant Floriline" are a Trade-Mark. Sold retail everywhere; and wholesale by the ANGLO-AMERICAN DRUG COMPANY, Limited, 33, Farringdon-road, London.

"Paris, Nov. 4, 1878.
"I have attentively examined the beautiful pianos of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons that are exhibited at the Paris International Exhibition of 1878. I consider them to be exceptional in the case with which gradations of sound can be produced, from the softest to the most powerful tones. These excellent pianos merit the approbation of all artists, as the tone is full as well as sustained, and the touch is of perfect evenness throughout its entire range, answering to every requirement of the pianist."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.

"Illustrated London News."
"The principle of the Brinsmead firm is to give the best piano of its kind, the best of materials, the best of care, the best of taste, and the best of finish, and this is why the manufactory in Kentish Town sends down to Wigmore-street so many pianos perfect in scale, sustained in tone, elastic in touch, with equal and responsive touch, and, in fact, as near as possible to that ideal that all musicians must require. A thing of beauty that is a joy for ever."
"Daily Chronicle."

"In tone the instrument is exceedingly rich and sweet, and in touch the very perfection of lightness. Messrs. Brinsmead may certainly be congratulated upon their success."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.

"Daily News."
"A new Pianoforte, recently manufactured by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, claims notice, not only on account of its beauty and richness of tone, but especially for some ingenious mechanical novelties, the most important being the addition of a third pedal, by means of which the sound of any note or notes may be almost indefinitely prolonged at the will of the player. Thus bass notes may be sustained after being struck by the left hand, which may then be taken away, and with the right hand, may execute the most brilliant staccato passages, thus giving almost the effect of four hands. The patent 'check-repeater' action, a speciality of Messrs. Brinsmead, enables the performer to command with ease the most rapid reiteration of the same note; the facility of the key movement in general being such that glissando passages can be executed with such perfect ease as to render them practicable with the lightest touch. The volume of tone is intensified by a peculiar construction of the sounding board, another improvement being the system of bridging by which the vibrations are increased and rendered sympathetic. The Pianoforte is capable of all degrees of delicacy and power, its massive structure rendering it less liable to get out of tune than usual; and the instrument is altogether calculated to extend the reputation of its makers."

SELECT MEDICAL OPINIONS.

SIR G. DUNCAN GIBB, Bart., M.D.,
Physician to the Westminster Hospital.
"The value of Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL as a therapeutic agent in a number of diseases, chiefly of an exhaustive character, has been admitted by the world of medicine; but, in addition, I have found it a remedy of great power in the treatment of many Affections of the Throat and Larynx, especially in Consumption of the latter, where it will sustain life when everything else fails."

DR. SINCLAIR COGHILL,
Physician Royal National Hospital for Consumption, Ventnor.

"I have convinced myself that in Tubercular and the various forms of Strumous Disease, Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL possesses greater therapeutic efficacy than any other Cod-Liver Oil with which I am acquainted. It was especially noted, in a large number of cases in which the patients protested they had never been able to retain or digest other Cod-Liver Oil, that Dr. DE JONGH'S OIL was not only tolerated, but taken readily, and with marked benefit."

DR. HUNTER SEMPLE,
Physician Hospital for Diseases of the Throat and Chest.

"I have long been aware of the great reputation enjoyed by the LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL introduced into medical practice by Dr. DE JONGH, and have recommended it with the utmost confidence. I have no hesitation in stating my opinion that it possesses all the qualities of a good and efficient medicine. Its taste is by no means disagreeable, and might even be called pleasant. I have found Dr. DE JONGH'S OIL very useful in cases of Chronic Cough, and especially in Laryngeal Disease complicated with Consumption."

JOSEPH J. POPE, Esq., M.R.C.S.,
Late Staff Surg., Army, Prof. of Hygiene, Birbeck Institution.

"I found during my Indian experience that the worth and character of Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL remained unchanged by tropical heat or foreign climate, and it was, from its uniformity of character, particularly adapted for long-continued administration. The value of 'hydro-carbons' in all debilitated states of the system is now becoming thoroughly recognised; and it is, without doubt, from the animal oils and fats, rather than from their vegetable substitutes, that we may hope to derive the true benefit. The Oil of Dr. DE JONGH places in everyone's reach a reliable and valuable remedy, one that cannot be too widely recognised."

DR. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL is sold ONLY in capsuled IMPERIAL Half-Pints, 2s. 6d.; Pints, 4s. 6d.; Quarts, 8s.; by all respectable Chemists and Druggists throughout the World.

LONDON: SATURDAY, APRIL 1, 1882.

Although the opposition in the House of Commons to increasing Prince Leopold's annuity from £15,000 to £25,000 on his marriage was unreasonable and ungracious, the debate itself was of some service. It enabled the Prime Minister to state some facts which are not generally known, or are in danger of being overlooked. Such grants were, he said, founded on an honourable understanding, as well as on the settled policy by which her Majesty at her accession to the Throne only received a Civil List adequate to her unmarried state, leaving her children to be provided for as occasion might require. Mr. Gladstone, at the same time, took the opportunity of denying that there had been such large savings on the Civil List as would enable her Majesty to provide adequately for her children. The division that was taken (387 to 42) may be said fairly to represent the relative proportion of outdoor opinion on the subject. In the main the British nation is, to speak mildly, perfectly content with its social and pecuniary relations to the Crown. If there had been—as was the case some sixty years ago—great extravagance on the part of the Sovereign, loud would have been the outcry. Not only is the Civil List more restricted, but the Queen sets an excellent example to her subjects by living within her means—means which are, we believe, proportionately more restricted than those of any European Potentate of the first rank. It is a pity such criticism as that of last week—some of it personally offensive—was not spared. The Duke of Albany is certainly not less deserving of national respect than the other members of the Royal Family to whom annuities have been granted. Young as he is, he has made a distinct and worthy sphere for himself by his earnest efforts on behalf of social and educational reforms. And at a time when all the Queen's many children heartily use their great influence, as occasion offers, to promote the welfare of the people or ameliorate suffering, it seems ungracious to act towards any of them in a grudging spirit. In view of the marriage ceremony at the end of this month, it is, however, gratifying to note that the allowance to the Princess Helen of £6000 a year in the event of her becoming a widow, was voted without a dissentient.

Whatever may be the ultimate fate of the Procedure Resolutions—and probably there will be more than one decisive, if not critical, vote on the subject—the Irish problem is gradually assuming new phases. The machinery of the Land Act is unequal to the strain put upon it, and the appointment of three or four new Sub-Commissioners is quite inadequate to meet the emergency, especially as there is less inclination on both sides than heretofore to effect amicable arrangements between landlords and tenants out of court. The task of defining "fair rents" is less difficult than that of solving the question of arrears, which, being the cause of frequent evictions, is one of the incentives to the shocking outrages that appal the public. Her Majesty's Ministers admit that further legislation is needed, and will probably be prepared with some proposals before the discussion is resumed on Mr. Findlater's bill for amending the Land Act, which, at their request, was postponed till the middle of May. It seems that the purchase clauses of that enactment have been inoperative; and Mr. W. H. Smith, who takes more of a national than a partisan view of the complex problem, intends to propose that the State shall provide pecuniary facilities with a view to enable occupiers to become absolute owners of their holdings. This is a new point of departure that may have important results and may be accepted as a favourable sign that the Opposition are ready to turn their attention to practical measures for mitigating the severity of the Irish crisis, instead of co-operating with the Irreconcilables in wasting the precious time in undue antagonism to the proposed New Rules. That would not, after all, be a barren Session, the fruits of which should be the regaining by the House of Commons of the power of dispatching business, and the passing of such measures as would materially hasten the settlement of the Irish Land question.

According to the present appearances, matters are very far from mending on the other side of St. George's Channel. Almost every day adds to the black catalogue of barbarous outrages against persons suspected of paying their rents—some of them so atrocious as to be hardly credible. Neither women nor children are spared by these miscreants, who, in one or two cases, as in the Dublin murder, have been ordered by a secret Fenian tribunal to assassinate their victims, and in one instance cut off a man's nose because he opposed the Land Leaguers in a poor-law guardian contest! For the past week there has been a cruel murder nearly every day, and the criminal record was varied on Monday by attempts in Galway and Kilkenny to blow up houses with dynamite. Notwithstanding the activity of the special magistrates, supported by a large force of constabulary, and an army of soldiers, many districts of Ireland are so much under a reign of terror that in the eastern districts of Galway, out of 249 outrages registered at the assizes, detection has followed crime in only thirty cases. Apparently coercion in Ireland has broken down; at least it has not repressed shocking outrages. Some six hundred Land Leaguers, the advocates of the no-rent programme, are in prison, the release of whom would be a remedy worse than the disease.

The extreme gravity of the crisis in Ireland was clearly indicated during the debate originated in the House of Commons on Tuesday by the Land Leaguers, who demanded that the three M.P.'s incarcerated as "suspects" should be allowed to come to London, on parole, in order that they might give their votes in the division on Mr. Marriott's amendment. Of course Mr. Gladstone had a conclusive reply in his two questions. If the imprisoned members were allowed to attend one division, why not all? Who was responsible for the murders, rapine, mutilations, and other outrages in Ireland? As Mr. Forster showed, the Land League had made no persistent and marked effort to discourage these atrocities on inoffensive men who desired to pay their just debts, which outrages were the direct result of the No-Rent manifesto of Mr. Parnell and his coadjutors. That manifesto, said the Chief Secretary, who has just returned from Ireland, had virtually failed; but he admitted that the Protection Act had not succeeded as the Government had hoped, and that "the state of things was still terrible; the conflict between lawlessness and order still went on." But, he proceeded to say, that as the outrages and murders must be, at all cost, stopped, it might become necessary "to apply to Parliament for further powers." This is a very grave declaration, coming from the lips of the Minister most responsible for the government of Ireland.

It is pleasant to turn from this subject to incidents that illustrate the heroic enterprise of which Englishmen are capable. The other day, before the Royal Geographical Society, Mr. O'Donovan himself told the fascinating story of his adventures at Merv—that mysterious city of Central Asia which imagination pictured as a city of palaces, the Key of Asiatic politics, but which the intrepid correspondent of the Daily News found to be a collection of wretched hovels tenanted by sheepskin-clothed barbarians, who partly live by plunder, and of half-starved cattle feeding in a bog. Mr. O'Donovan found it easier to get into this dilapidated oasis in the desert than to make his way out, after he had been made one of the three rulers of Merv, in the hope that he might secure British protection for the Tekke Turkomans. Colonel Burnaby, whose daring explorations in that Central African region (at Khiva) vie in romantic interest with those of Mr. O'Donovan, has been reaping fresh laurels in another direction. The narrative he has given of his solitary balloon expedition from Dover to Caen in Normandy reveals a presence of mind rarely equalled, as well as the unforeseen perils that attend such aerial excursions. While suspended over the Channel the currents changed rapidly and the balloon drifted about, but at an altitude of some 2000 ft. at last became motionless. Seeing the clouds tending towards the French coast, the gallant Colonel in desperation threw out all his ballast, and was in a few moments 11,000 ft. above the sea level, and happily travelling with immense velocity towards France, and he was able to make his descent about a dozen miles from Dieppe. Under apparently favourable conditions, nothing but his marvellous nerve saved him. When the issue of such enterprises is incalculable, is it not folly to attempt them?

At the ripe age of seventy-five Henry Wadsworth Longfellow has gone to his rest. He carries with him the profound respect and unaffected regrets of English-speaking people throughout the world. Though not a genius of the first rank, he was more popular than many a poet of greater vigour and more brilliant imagination, and his themes were such—including the pleasures of domestic life, the glory of self-sacrifice, and the sanctifying influence of suffering—as appealed to the universal human heart. He was not, like many of his contemporaries, a strictly American poet, for nearly all that his muse produced, from the time when he was an undergraduate at Bowdoin College to the period when, at his charming home in Massachusetts, he polished his last verses, might have been written in "the old country," where he was as well known and esteemed as in the land of his birth. His life was stainless as his death was tranquil. Probably he never had an enemy in the world, and few writers of the present era have done more to inspire noble emotions, lighten the anguish of suffering, and strengthen faith in the verities of religion.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

Three times only in the course of a life which, to the copyholder of it, at least, seems to have been a very long one, have these eyes gazed upon Alfred Tennyson, Poet Laureate. The first time was in Westminster Abbey, on the occasion of the marriage of the poet's son to the daughter of yet another wearer of "Daphne's deathless leaf," Frederick Locker. The second time was in the Theatre of the Royal Institution, a fortnight since. The third time was last Sunday, in a great picture-gallery, which at certain times and seasons becomes the private salon of a great lady. Thomas Moore (a little man in a white hat) and Thomas Campbell (a little man in a brown swallow-tailed coat with brass buttons) I remember to have seen once, in my boyhood. Victor Hugo I have never seen. Nor Lamartine, nor Alfred de Musset. With the poet Bryant I have had the honour to converse at the Century Club, New York. It is good in the evening of your life to recall the famous faces that you have seen, and the clarion voices that you have listened to. One face and one voice are visible and audible to the eyes and ears of my mind, now, as I am penning this paragraph. The face and the voice are those of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, who is dead, and for whom the whole English-speaking world mourns.

One of the most delightful afternoons that I can remember to have passed was spent with Mr. Longfellow, at his home at Cambridge, near Boston, U.S.A., late in the spring of 1864. I placed on printed record at the time that I had rarely met with a more beautiful man than the author of "Evangeline." I used the term "beautiful" advisedly, because Johnson has used it with reference to the personal appearance in youth of Milton; and Longfellow was facially as handsome as a poet ought to be. The world, happily, has seen very few great poets who were ill-favoured. Shakespeare, Spenser, Sidney, Tasso, Molière, Byron, Tennyson, Browning, Hugo, Shelley, Alfieri, Goethe, Schiller, Lamartine, Chateaubriand—all shapely and comely visages. Was Pope's an ugly face? I think not. In Longfellow, the beautiful soul shone through the beautiful features.

Mr. Longfellow talked, as the Americans have it, "all the time," and it was truly a liberal education to hear him talk, and to listen to "son franc et beau parler plein de choses sensibles," as Balzac says of his imaginary Marshal Hulot. I had just come back from the Mexican war in 1864, and Mr. Longfellow was very anxious to know if the wonderfully vivid picture of local scenery given by Mr. Prescott in his "Conquest of Mexico" coincided with the actual aspect of the strange land of the cumbres and the tierra caliente. I told my interlocutor that it did so coincide, from the prickles on the mapal to the grey green leaves of the magney: save in one particular. The blind topographer of the country of the Aztecs had taken no account of the Dust. And the dust in Mexico assumes phenomenal proportions. Collecting in the cavernous fissures in the mountain sides, the wind twists it into spiral columns, which you see swaying and dancing, as it seems, miles before you in the great desert plains where nothing grows save the cactus and the prickly pear; and at evening, when the departing sun encrimsons these dusty eddies, you think of the Pillar of Cloud by day which became a Pillar of Fire by night, that the Israelites of old wotted of.

And your favourite morsel of Longfellow? Which is it? Is it "The Belfry of Bruges," or "Evangeline," or "The Hanging of the Crane," or "The Skeleton in Armour," or "The Village Blacksmith," or "The Psalm of Life," or, haply, "Excelsior"? I am, myself, no great reader of modern lyric poetry, chiefly because I have an essentially and coarsely prosaic understanding; and next, what little leisure I have for poesy reading is given to the study of the Old Men who wrote in other tongues; and they are hard to master, and the time is very short. Yet have I my favourite, my pet morsel of the sweet singer who is gone. It is the poem of "Endymion." The word-painting is delicious, to begin with. The thoughts which underlie the rhyme are noble, and tender and pure. There is one verse which seems to me to embody an enduring hope and consolation to all ugly men and all "plain" girls. It is the stanza beginning—

No one is so accus'd by Fate,
No one so utterly desolate;
But some heart, though unknown
Responds unto his own.

There is an analogous thought in the maxims of Leonardo da Vinci, where he tells us that no woman, not being absolutely a Monster, need despair of finding, sooner or later, a fervent admirer who shall love her for herself alone.

But there is another reason why I cherish Longfellow's "Endymion" as a most precious gem. It "sings" so well. It may be my brutish incapacity to understand poetry that leads me to the conclusion; but, to my mind, there are but few modern poets of eminence (Moore and Campbell always excepted) whose writings can be happily wedded to tune. Balfe's air to "Come into the Garden, Maud," was an exceptionally successful tour de force. I have heard Byron's "Maid of Athens" set to music, and I did not like it. "Lady Clara Vere de Vere" as a song might not, perhaps, be pleasant. There was a little Lyric in "The Cup" at the Lyceum, intoned with exquisitely pathetic expression by Miss Ellen Terry; but it was a chant, and not a song. On the other hand, the very common-place words of two very mediocre poets, Thomas Haynes Bayley and George Linley, suit with perfect harmony two of the most beautiful of modern English ballads, "She wore of Wreath of Roses" and "The Spirit of Love." And—tell it not in Gath!—did not the "Poet" Bunn write the words to "I dreamt that I dwelt in Marble Hall" in the "Bohemian Girl," and "Turn on, Old Time, thine Hour Glass," in "Maritana"?

"Endymion" "sings" delightfully. Curiously enough, it fits as symmetrically as a six-and-a-quarter glove fits the lily hand of the adored one of your heart, the very rich and flowing melody to "Di Pescatore Ignobile" in Donizetti's "Lucrezia Borgia." Try it, ladies, on your pianofortes, and with your dulcet voices. But the instrument, I take it, to which "Endymion" would sing most sweetly, is the harp.

I was rash, I fear, in seeking to pry into the derivation of "helter-skelter," for correspondents are coming down upon me in their scores; and I dread, ere long, the onslaughts of questioners concerning the origin of "popsy-vopsy," "tittle tattle," "tip-top," "harum-scarum," "ods-bobs," and "humpty-dumpty." Meanwhile, "W. H. D." observes that he was always of opinion that "helter-skelter" was derived from the Latin "aliter et celeriter," several ways and quickly. "F. M., Leeds, maintains that "helter-skelter" is only Pliny's "aliter atque aliter," first one way then another, roughly Englished.

Another advocate of the Latin derivation of "helter-skelter" incidentally remarks that the phrase to rain "cats and dogs" is only the Greek kata doxein. Thanks, very much. Another suggests that "helter skelter" has its origin in the expression "hilariter et celeriter" in one of Cicero's Orations. But "R. L." (Chesterfield) plainly tells me that I am looking up in the sky or over the sea for what is really under my feet. "R. L." holds that "helter skelter" has reference primarily to a "stampede" of horses or cattle which when not in use are secured by means of a halter, always pronounced in the rural districts of the North of England as "helter." "Skelter," according to my plain-speaking correspondent, is either a reduplication, or may have something to do with "skaut," or perhaps the O. E. "Scuddle," to run away. "Helter skelter" may thus be a cousin-German of "hurry-scurry."

All this, of course, is sadly unscientific. I am guiltily reminded of this when I find an esteemed correspondent, "F. S.," courteously informing me that Professor Skeat, in his dictionary, disdainfully declines to take any notice of "helter skelter" at all. Wedgwood, continues my correspondent, gives a hodge-podge of Norse and Scandinavian derivations; "helter" may be the German "holter polter," a hurly burly (but the German for "helter skelter" is "über hals und kopf"). "Skelter" may be from the Swedish "Skulla," to yell, or the Gaelic "sgal," shriek. My correspondent arrives, à la longue, at the sage conclusion that "all we know is that nothing can be known."

It is in the worst of taste, no doubt, for one contributor to a newspaper to comment upon what another contributor has written in another column of the same journal. I wilfully sin against the canons of taste for the purpose of pointing out a somewhat curious coincidence. Some weeks ago there was running at one of the London theatres (the Imperial, I think) a sensational melodrama called "Macfarlane's Will." Throughout three long acts the characters were continually searching for the will, which was at last discovered on the top of a wardrobe which accidentally tumbles down. Now turn to the "Wills and Bequests" column in this journal, and you will find "Macfarlane's Will" with a vengeance. In the last days of December, 1881 (even while the melodrama was running), died Mr. James Macfarlane, a West India merchant, and by his will, which was proved on the sixth ult., the testator leaves to his widow, subject to the payment of his just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, a sum exceeding eight hundred and ninety thousand pounds sterling. Truth is very much stranger than fiction.

Whether the Editor of my respected contemporary the Boot and Shoe Trades Journal hails from ayont the Tweed I do not know, but he is evidently a very "canny" gentleman. Bearing commendably in mind the traditional precept that "There is Nothing like Leather," the conductor of the organ devoted to the interests of the sons of St. Crispin sought to have a peep at the far-famed Rational Dress Society's Exhibition at the Cavendish Rooms, Mortimer-street. But he found it a case of Paradise and the Peri. He or his male representative was sternly told by the lady secretary that "Men would not be admitted under any circumstances." "So," continues the "canny" editor, "we were obliged to seek out a new contributor who understood the shoe trade and wore petticoats." Hear Crispina-Crispinetta:

On stands and about the room in various places were articles of ladies' costumes, and there were quite a number of draped wooden figures wearing the divided skirt which the Viscountess Harborton and the ladies of her way of thinking advocate. My instructions were to notice particularly the boots which were worn with the new dresses; but, when I came to examine the feet of the draped figures, why, they had no boots on at all. I certainly expected to find that the divided skirt costume was a very short one, which would show the wearer's boots very much; but it did nothing of the kind. I don't know exactly whether I ought to do so, but I suppose I must say what the dress consists of, so that it may be understood that any boots can be worn with it. The lower part is a garment very much like the baggy trousers Turkish women wear, but instead of being confined at the ankles, they are very wide and loose, and are ornamented with a deep frill.

All this is highly instructive, as well as amusing; but, Madam, Madam, is there not the letting of a most monstrous cat out of a bag in these disclosures? Crispina-Crispinetta saw some "Greek" dresses also; and she has the hardihood to remark, "I fear that if I met a stout lady wearing a Greek dress, I should be rude enough to laugh at her. I couldn't help it." O! Crispina-Crispinetta.

The lady contributor did see some boots at last, although she was surprised that so few specimens were shown. They were all very much of the same character, being either buttoned or laced; the Society objecting altogether to the side springs, on the ground that they confine the ankles and impede the circulation of the blood. The "rational" boots had a tendency to square-toedness, and, of course, had low heels, "being, indeed, the cottage or 'top-piece' heels one sees worn in out-of-the-way country places." One firm exhibited a boot which was a combination of a button and lace fastening; "but," naively remarks Crispina-Crispinetta, "I could not understand the object of it, nor could anyone tell me." This is as candid as the confession of the law-reporter in Pope's parody of one of the old Norman-French "Year Books, "Je heard no more, parceque je fell asleep sur mong banc."

In the end, the lady contributor does not hesitate to avow herself a Wasp-Waist Sister. She says:—"The evils of tight-lacing were, as one might expect, shown to be very dreadful; but then, one might as well suffer a little from tight-lacing as suffer one's self to look as loose and dishabillé as some of these ladies and doctors would have one look."

Words! Still words! My old friend Mr. George Bentley tells me that Professor David Masson, in his interesting essay on De Quincey, speaks (p. 110) of his (the Opium Eater's) "fugitations." Is the latinism, asks my friend, "worth noticing in the Echoes; and would it not be as well to stick to plain Anglo-Saxon if a good word can be found in it to suit the purpose in view?" Humph. "Fugitation" is not in Roget's "Thesaurus of English Words and Phrases," that perennial joy to journalists; it is not in the "Library Dictionary," not in Phillips' "New World of Words," not in the latest and lately published edition of Chambers's Etymological Dictionary (although "fugaciousness" may therein be found), and not in Bailey.

Plucky Colonel Burnaby has done that which gallant Colonel Brine and Mr. Simmons failed in doing. The Khivan cavalier, the dashing soldier, the accomplished linguist, the uncompromising Tory who means to carry Birmingham some day (if he can), the rival of Horatius Coeles, and victor of the Pill-er of Hercules, and, finally, the skilled "balloonatic"—with plenty of method in his madness—has crossed the Channel and landed near the Château de Montigny, in the department of Calvados. It is strange that the unfortunate Lieutenant Gale, R.N., should have performed the self-same feat and landed in the same neighbourhood more than thirty years ago.

I have frequently spoken of poor Gale in this page because I admired his undaunted bravery, and personally liked him, and was, indeed, associated with him in a business enterprise connected with ballooning. The original idea of what are called "captive" balloons was certainly not his; but he was the first to suggest restricted balloon ascents in the Arctic Regions, with a view to discovering relics of the expedition of Sir John Franklin. Gale's reward for his pains was to be mercilessly laughed at, and, with one exception, to be consistently snubbed by all persons of power and influence, official and otherwise. The exception was the Prince Consort, who took some kindly interest in the Lieutenant's scheme for "partial ascents." But the Admiralty turned on the proposal a shoulder even colder than the Arctic regions; and the thing came to nothing.

Of course we are no nearer the solution of the problem of aerial navigation than we were before Colonel Burnaby's gallant exploit. I only record it as a brilliant example of cool, clear-headed courage—and good luck. The rider to Khiva is an exceptionally lucky gentleman.

A correspondent, "B," believes that the complaint made in the "Echoes" last week of the inaccuracy of Friar Laurence's brown frock is unfounded. "B" points out that in Southern Europe a considerable portion of the sheep are born with brown fleeces, and that of this wool is woven an undyed cloth which is commonly worn by friars and peasants. In support of this contention "B" is so kind as to forward me a sample of raw wool of a rich burnt umber hue.

But, in defence of my own contention that the Franciscans were not brown friars I quote side by side the Latin and Italian text of Father Filippo Bonanni's observations on the Franciscan habit in his "Catalogue of the Religious Orders" (Rome 1706):—

Demum post aliud Schisma sub Martiri V. auspiciis, Franciscanus Ordo dictus Fratrum Minorum de Observantia feliciter floruit ob formam precipue, quam sub Eugenio IV. anno 1430. Lancam vestem ex panno supra nudum corpus gerunt ejus Alumnus, eoque fons circa lumbos ligant. Caputium habent rotundum, cui veluti collare adnectitur Aralis impositum. Mantellum ex eodem panno addunt ultra genua parum productum. Color autem est qualis efficitur ex duabus partibus lane nigrae nativi coloris, et una alba.	A questi mold altri si unirono, e scelerate altre controversie nell' Ordine, cominciò sotto Martino V. a fiorire felicemente, e poi sotto Eugenio IV. l'anno 1430. Usano questi vesti di panno di lana sopra la nuda carne, che cingono e n grossa fune, hanno il capuccio tondo, a cui è annesso un giro in forma di collare sopra le spalle. Hanno mantello del medesimo panno, poco più lungo oltre le ginocchia. Il colore è composto con due partioni di lana nera del color naturale, e una di bianca.

The picture accompanying this minute description of a grey, not a brown, habit translates as well as line engraving can translate words the Franciscan frock and mantle as of very light grey. But I have proof more positive. I read in Stow that in 1244 four Grey Franciscan friars arrived in London from Italy, and obtained, by the assistance of the Preaching Friars, a temporary residence in Cornhill. There were grey Franciscans, you see, as early as 1244. The period assigned to the costumes at the Lyceum is about 1400. The Church of the Grey Friars was consecrated in 1325; and in 1429 Lord Mayor Whittington ("Turn again," Dick) founded in connection with the church a handsome library. Christ's Hospital stands on part of the site of the magnificent monastery of the Grey Franciscan Friars; and Christ Church, Newgate-street (built by Sir Christopher) replaces the old Franciscan Church.

Mem.: The "Grey Friars' Chronicle" has been published by the Camden Society; and the Grey Friars' Chronicle (a disestablished Franciscan) is frequently quoted by Dean Milman in his "Annals of St. Paul's Cathedral."

THE PLAYHOUSES.

"Dark is the Hour before the Dawn"—that is a proverbial location with which we should all be pretty well acquainted; but, touching the Playhouses, it may almost proverbially be said that "Desperately Dull are the Days just before Easter." The theatres may all be very well attended; yet, with a few exceptions, the audience seem to feel that they are assisting at the fag-end of this or that successful "run" of a piece; while the managers, if they have any momentous novelty in preparation, carefully abstain from producing it until Paschal tide has come and gone. You may say that Lent has something to do with the languor which, notwithstanding well filled, if not actually crowded houses, seems to pervade the theatrical world during the last days of March. Well; I am old enough to remember when the theatres were closed twice a week during the period between Ash Wednesday and Passion Week, and when in Holy Week itself no theatrical performances were allowed at all. The dramatic "rinascimento" on Easter Monday was consequently on the most brilliant scale. At nearly all the theatres new pieces were brought out. Two or three burlesques were always among the array of novelties of the spring; and I have even seen an Easter Pantomime. I daresay my friend Mr. E. L. Blanchard remembers a Grand Comic Christmas Pantomime which was absolutely performed just after midsummer. Fancy a transformation scene in July! Imagine the unutterably ghastly appearance of a clown in the dog days! But you who can remember old Vauxhall Gardens by daylight, can call to mind even a more doleful spectacle than that of Mr. Clown singing "Tippety-witchet" with the thermometer at eighty-five in the shade. Easter Monday is, however, no longer that which, in the parlance of the late Mr. Edward Wright, it "used to be." Greenwich Fair has long since been suppressed; and the younger generation would yawn and stare if I discoursed on the bygone glories of Richardson's Show and the Crown and Anchor dancing-booth. It is no longer an article of faith to don some brand-new item of wearing apparel on Easter Sunday; and we have even ceased to hang murderers in front of the Debtor's Door, Newgate, over against the King of Denmark tavern, on Easter Monday, which is now only a Bank Holiday, good for the railway companies and the public houses, and bad for the deposits in the Post-office Savings Banks.

At two of the playhouses experiments have recently been made in dramatising the works of popular novelists. At the New Sadler's Wells (of late years a singularly unlucky theatre), an American actress, of considerable personal attractions and no small dramatic talent, Miss Ella Stockton, has produced her own version of Mr. William Black's charming romance of "Madcap Violet," in which, so it seems to me, there is not much that is susceptible of dramatisation save the inimitably vivacious school-room scene and the "sensational header" episode in the Highland loch. Of course Miss Ella Stockton had the full permission of Mr. William Black to turn his novel into a play (which achieved on the first night a fair amount of success, but which has now been withdrawn); still, I cannot help thinking that there are others of Mr. Black's books—notably "Three Feathers," "A Princess of Thule," and "A Daughter of Heth"—which are much more susceptible than is "Madcap Violet" of adaptation to the stage. Yet Miss Ella Stockton has gained, according to general report, bright laurels in the United States through this play, the run of which only endured for a week, and for which the popular dramatic version of Mrs. Henry Wood's novel of "East Lynne" has now been substituted.

At the Globe, where the capital sensational melodrama of "Mankind" still urges on its wild career like Mazeppa on his horse at Astley's, the work of another novelist of a very different calibre from Mr. William Black has been turned into a play by Mr. Hamilton, a rising member, I am given to understand, of the dramatic profession, and a playwright of promising capacity. In the last-named department of art Mr. Hamilton has yet his spurs to win: those which have accrued to him through the morning performance of last Saturday at the Lyceum do not appear to be of the portentous size of the historic "espuelas de Amozoc" in Mexico, which are, I believe, the biggest and sharpest spurs manufactured. I hear that Mr. Hamilton's adaptation of the novel of "Moths," by the brilliant lady who elects to assume the nom de plume of "Ouida," is very smooth, and, in some parts, very forcible; and that the acting of Miss Marie Litton and of Mr. Kyrie Bellow was admirable. If "Moths" takes its place on the stage of the Globe as an evening performance, I shall have great pleasure in witnessing it. I may add that I shall be wholly unprejudiced as to its merits; as, with the exception of a few chapters in a novel called "Folle-Farine," I have never read any of the brilliant Ouida's productions. A complete set of her writings stares me in the face, reproachfully, from their shelf; but life is not long enough to read novels, à cette heure.

It is tolerably notorious that the Hamiltonian adaptation of "Moths" was not made with "Ouida's" consent, and that an animated controversy has been going on for some time past in the columns of one of the most solemn of my contemporaries concerning what the Editor has been pleased to call the "Dramatic Moralities." In this case I can likewise afford to be wholly impartial and unprejudiced. It is my business to be a writer in newspapers, and not of novels and plays. When, like the cobbler, I have stuck to my last, I have prospered fairly enough; but whenever I have temporarily laid aside the lapstone and the awl to kick my heels behind the scenes of a theatre—to wrestle with wild beasts at Ephesus, and to struggle with the perverse people of the footlights, I have failed. Thus also has it usually been the case when I have had to write a novel. It is not until I reach the beginning of the third volume (so many kind readers have told me) that any definite idea is conveyed to the public mind as to what the story is about. But this "Dramatic Moralities" controversy (which has been in progress "off and on" ever since, five-and-forty years ago or so, Mr. Charles Dickens protested against the sham-less piracy on the stage of his novels of "Pickwick," "Oliver Twist," and "Nicholas Nickleby") might, I venture to think, be very speedily and satisfactorily brought to an end if the professional dramatists who are anxious to dramatisé popular novels would adopt the very simple expedient of paying the popular novelists for the right of turning their romances into plays. I apprehend that M. Busnach pays M. Emile Zola a good round sum for permission to adapt for theatrical use a work of fiction of the "Assommoir" or the "Nana" type. "First catch your hare" Mrs. Glasse did not say; but I venture to hint to the professional playwright—"First catch your popular novelist with a stout cheque." It is not, I would submit, a question of "Dramatic," but of "Old Bailey," Morality when playwrights talk of their "privileges" to steal the products of novelists' brains, and insult them into the bargain. Pay the novelists, I repeat, and they will gladly consent to have their novels dramatised. But scornful repudiation of the rights of the original inventor is piracy, and something more.

MUSIC.

The Philharmonic Society's seventieth season is approaching its close, but two more concerts remaining to be given in termination of this series. At the fourth concert—last week—the Prince and Princess of Wales were present, and the occasion included Madame Schumann's very fine performance of Mendelssohn's first Pianoforte Concerto (in G minor), which was produced at one of these concerts just fifty years ago, when it was played by its gifted composer, then just in the first period of his brilliant genius. Last week's concert also included effective orchestral renderings of Mr. Stanford's overture to "The Veiled Prophet," and that to Weber's "Euryanthe," and Beethoven's C minor symphony; and vocal pieces rendered by Mdlle. Kufferuth and Mr. Maas. Mr. Cusins conducted, as usual, with the exception of Mr. Stanford's direction of his own overture.

A few lines must be added to our last week's necessarily brief record of the performance, for the first time at the Royal Albert Hall, of Berlioz's "Faust" music, which was given with special excellence by the large band (augmented for the occasion) and gigantic choir directed by Mr. Barnby. The fine Hungarian March, and the delicate "Ballet of Sylphs" were encored, and these, and the picturesque orchestral details during Faust's dream, and the wondrous music illustrating the infernal ride of Faust and Mephistopheles, were admirably rendered, as were the several choruses, particularly that of peasants, the Easter hymn, the choral music for students and soldiers, and the mixed religious and infernal strains at the close. The solo music for Margaret was very gracefully sung by Madame Marie Roze, Mr. V. Rigby de-claimed well the passages for Faust, as did Mr. F. King those for Mephistopheles, and Mr. Pyatt sang Brander's song effectively. Mr. Barnby conducted ably.

Mr. W. Macfarren's series of orchestral concerts at St. James's Hall closed, last Saturday evening, with the third concert of the series. As on the previous occasions, the instrumental performances were generally of special excellence. Spohr's great symphony, "Die Weihe der Töne" (known here as "The Power of Sound"), Mendelssohn's overture to "Ruy Blas," and those by Mr. Macfarren, entitled "Hero and Leander" and "King Henry the Fifth," were admirably played: Herr Joachim gave a fine rendering of Beethoven's violin concerto; Miss Cantelo made a very successful first appearance in her performance of Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A minor, and vocal pieces were well rendered by Miss C. Samuël.

The operetta entitled "Kevin's Choice," produced at the Adelphi Theatre last Saturday afternoon, is the composition of Mr. Wallworth, for whose benefit the performance took place, and who sustained very effectively the character of Patrick, one of the two pairs of lovers, the principal of whom are Kathleen and Kevin. The plot of the piece is too slight to need specific detail, but is sufficient to serve as a vehicle for pleasing if not very original music, the chief merit of which is that it is well written for vocal effect. The best pieces are the duets, "Oh! how I hate" (for Bridget and Patrick); "Sleep, sleep" (for Kathleen and Kevin), and "Be firm" (for Bridget and Kevin); Kathleen's ballad, "A youth met a maiden," and her air, "I cannot own;" Kevin's air, "My heart some strange foreboding chills," and his serenade, "Awake, awake;" the Priest's song in the first act, and a spirited quintet at the close of the second and last act. The characters of Kathleen, Bridget, Kevin, Patrick, and Father Beamish were, respectively, well filled by Madame Edith Wynne, Miss L. Franklin, Mr. Walsham, Mr. Wallworth, and Mr. Pyatt. Herr K. Meyder conducted the performance.

A supplemental (morning) Ballad Concert, on Wednesday, terminated the sixteenth season of these popular entertainments, which have been so successfully conducted by Mr. John Boosey. The programme on this closing occasion was of the usual varied and attractive nature, having comprised the names of Misses Davies, Blandy, and Santley, Madame Antoinette Sterling; Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Maybrick, Mr. Santley, and the members of the South London Choral Association; with Mr. Carrodus as solo violinist.

The London Musical Society gave the first concert of the fourth season at St. James's Hall on Thursday evening, when the programme comprised the late Hermann Goetz's and Herr Brahms's settings of Schiller's "Nænia," and other pieces.

The students of Madame Sainton Dolby's vocal academy gave the first of three subscription concerts at Steinway Hall on Thursday afternoon, when some of her pupils contributed to a varied programme.

Miss Cecile Hartog—the well-known pianist—gave an evening concert at the Royal Academy of Music, on Thursday, in association with other eminent artists.

The Sacred Harmonic Society gave the last performance but one of their fiftieth season yesterday (Friday) evening, when Sir Michael Costa's oratorio "Eli" was given, Mr. Sainton conducting during Sir Michael's illness.

The Musical Artists' Society gives the twenty-fourth performance of new compositions at the Royal Academy of Music this evening, when vocal and instrumental pieces by S. G. R. Coles, C. J. Read, Mr. B. Foster, O. Prescott, W. H. Holmes, E. Aguilar, and Dr. G. Wolff are to be brought forward.

A new musical instrument was tried, for the first time in public, in the speech-room of Harrow School on Thursday week. The instrument, which is the invention of Mr. Baillie Hamilton (a former Harrovian), is described as somewhat resembling a full-sized harmonium, with two key-boards, the sounds being produced by reeds similar to those used in harmoniums, but inclosed in wooden pipes. In power and expressive quality the results of the trial were considered to be eminently satisfactory. Princess Louise and Mr. Gladstone were expected to be present, but were prevented from attending, but were present at another trial of the instrument on Saturday afternoon.

Madame Schumann and Herr Joachim have continued to give special attraction to the Monday Popular Concerts, the twenty-fourth season of which will close next Monday.

The fifteenth annual concert of the Edinburgh University Musical Society was given yesterday week, under the direction of Sir Herbert Oakeley. It was very successful.

Count Geza Zichy, the one-armed Hungarian pianist, will appear at several concerts in London during the season. The Count lost his right arm when a boy, and his musical performances with his left hand only are said to be remarkable. He performs only for charitable purposes, and he has earned and distributed 200,000 florins during the last two years.

The Royal Italian Opera Company, Limited, seems now to be an accomplished fact. With the possession of the establishments and belongings of the Covent Garden opera house, the adjoining Floral Hall, and of Her Majesty's Theatre; with Mr. Ernest Gye as managing director, and Mr. Mapleson as superintendent of the company's operatic business in America, there should seem to be every prospect of success. The Italian season at Covent Garden Theatre begins on April 18, and the arrangements will probably include the production of an Italian version of a new French opera, Velléda—composed by M. Lenepveu—Madame Patti taking the principal character; Mozart's "Il Flauto Magico," with an improved libretto from the French; Boito's "Mefistofele," with Madame Albani and Madame Trebelli; and "Carmen," with Madame Pauline Lucca in the title-character—there being a possibility of bringing out M. Massenet's new opera "Herodiade." Besides the artists just named, other well-known names reappear in the prospectus, and new appearances will be made by Mdlle. Olga Berghi (soprano), Mdlle. Amelie Stahl (contralto), Signori Lestellier and Massart (tenors), and MM. Bouhy and Dufrique and Signor Devries (baritones). Madame Lucca is to repeat her celebrated performance as Selika in Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine," in which the important part of Inez will be sustained by Madame Albani. The orchestra and chorus will be similar to those of last season; Signor Bevigiani and M. Dupont will again divide the duties of conductor, and other offices will be mostly filled as before: M. Lapissida replacing Signor Tagliacoco as stage manager, in consequence of this gentleman's ill-health.

The movement inaugurated by the Prince of Wales to found a Royal College of Music is meeting with large support. In addition to the subscriptions promised by the London Corporation and City Companies over £50,000 has been given, so that the first £100,000 of the original sum of £300,000 required for the undertaking has been practically secured. In the course of the present month meetings are to be held in most of the large provincial towns in order to more specifically point out the character of the work the new institution will undertake. Many gentlemen connected with the colonies assembled at Marlborough House on Thursday week, on the invitation of the Prince of Wales, when his Royal Highness explained the project for the establishment of this college, and appealed to the colonies to assist in the undertaking.—Sir Erasmus Wilson has promised to give £2500 to found a scholarship in the Royal College, including education and maintenance; and the Company of Mercers have voted in its aid £2500, to be paid in five annual instalments.—A concert in aid of the endowment fund of the Royal College of Music will be given on May 13, in the Floral Hall, Covent-garden, by the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society, of which the Queen and the Prince of Wales are patrons, and the Duke of Edinburgh is president.

THE INSURRECTION IN HERZEGOVINA.

A panoramic view of the Dalmatian or Illyrian provinces of the Austrian Empire, with the neighbouring highlands of Herzegovina and Montenegro, will be found in our Supplement this week. It is drawn, upon a small scale, by an Austrian artist well acquainted with those countries, and will be sufficient to show the position of the mountainous theatre of war, in its bearings on the Adriatic seaports of Ragusa and Cattaro, which form the base of operations against the insurgents. Crivoscie, a small tribal district, little more than a large parish and village, where the revolt broke out in resistance to the enforced Austrian military conscription, is indicated amongst a number of other places, the Forts Dragalj, Ledenice, Mamula, della Spagnuolo, and della Trinità, the Stanievich Convent, Zuppa, the historic cradle of Slavonic independence on this side, and many fields of sharp fighting in past times and in the present. The Isle of Lacroia, near Ragusa, has a certain interest for Englishmen as the scene of the captivity of King Richard Cœur de Lion, who was shipwrecked there on his voyage home from the crusade in Palestine. Our remaining illustrations of the recent warfare in those parts comprise the Sketch of an ambuscade of the insurgents lying in wait to cut off a detachment of Austrian troops; that of another party of these warlike mountaineers, retiring with their dead and wounded to take refuge beyond the Montenegrin frontier; and that of the inspection of an Austrian regiment at Cattaro. It has been mentioned that the fort at Dragalj, held by the insurgents of Crivoscie, was captured by the Austrians and blown up on the 10th inst. We learn that several "bands" have been driven across the frontier of Montenegro, and that the positions on the coast have been taken by combined operations of the army and some war-ships.

MR. SALA AS A JOURNALIST.

In one of Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin's Popular Shilling Library volumes, entitled "English Journalism and the Men who have Made It," by Charles Pebody, the history and present position of the newspaper press are vigorously and clearly set forth, without prejudice or favouritism. Mr. Pebody has a happy knack of portraying character, as the subjoined sketch of a gentleman well known to our readers will show:—

George Augusta Sala, if not the most distinguished, is the most characteristic of English journalists. There may be abler men, wittier men, more brilliant men; but Mr. Sala combines brilliancy, wit, and ability of a higher order, and combines them in such a serviceable form that he is today one of the most popular of English writers, and as a newspaper contributor without a rival in his own special line. Dr. Russell and Mr. Archibald Forbes may sketch a field of battle in a way that Mr. Sala could not touch; but fields of battle do not, happily, often call for the descriptive powers of a Russell or a Forbes; and, except upon a field of battle, Mr. Sala is practically a man without a rival. His readiness, his picturesque sensibility, his aptitude for vivid and graphic writing, his great powers of expression, and his still greater powers of illustration, constitute him the beau-ideal of a journalist. Art, literature, fiction, antiquities, all are alike to him. There is no subject that he is not prepared to write a column upon at ten minutes notice—a comet, a speech, a coup-d'état, a crisis in Paris or Pekin; and there are not many subjects upon which, if he takes up his pen at ten o'clock, he cannot by midnight turn out a chatty and readable column for the next morning. The Daily Telegraph possesses many able men upon its staff—men who have made politics the study of their lives, scholars, sportsmen, special correspondents of the most diversified and distinguished attainments, picturesque writers of all sorts, critics who have neither failed in literature nor art. But even among men of this calibre, the most striking and conspicuous figure is that of this gentleman who, with a vivacity and energy that have never been surpassed, has travelled over the greater part of the world as the special correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, and is now, at fifty-three, to be found in his study most mornings turning out articles and critiques upon the topics of social life, of art, or literature, marked by all the freshness and vigour of thirty-five. . . . Mr. Sala has written books which constitute a library in themselves—works of travel, works of fiction, burlesques, biography, criticism. These works are to be found upon every bookstall and in every circulating library. Many of them have gone through a succession of editions. But Mr. Sala, with all his diversified gifts, is pre-eminently and above all a journalist—a man endowed by nature with the precise gifts that are needed in a special correspondent and in a writer of leading articles; and it is as a leader-writer and special correspondent that he will be best remembered. His contributions to the Daily Telegraph have for many years been one of the most characteristic features of the paper.

"Good Words," which is never wanting in special attraction over and above the general merit of its literature and art, contains in the number for April six engravings of pictures illustrating Quebec and its neighbourhood, from the portfolio of the Princess Louise, accompanied by an ode addressed to the city by the Marquis of Lorne. Her Royal Highness, a member of the Royal Water Colour Society of England, has, since her residence in Quebec, honoured the exhibitions in Pall-mall with drawings made from various spots in Canada; and the interest raised by these views, faithful in representation and delicate in manipulative skill, is further gratified by the publication of the present series.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

Paris, Tuesday, March 28.

One of the most singular and regular traits of society at Paris is that at least every fortnight there springs up some topic, some new commonplace of conversation, great or small—a comet or a revolution, an earthquake or a Cabinet crisis, a scandal or a new book. Everywhere the same subject is discussed, in every salon the eternal commonplace is exhausted over and over again, treated from all points of view seven days out of the week, until it is finally exterminated, and people cry mercy, and fortune provides another subject. The new commonplace of the moment is "Les Rantzau," a comedy in four acts, produced at the Comédie Française last night. The authors are MM. Erckmann-Chatrian, whose patriotic and Alsatian romances are so popular as reading-books amongst teachers of French. "Les Rantzau" proved to be an immense success for the actors. The piece itself is inferior and lacking in interest. It is a sort of "Romeo and Juliet" without the love duo. The Rantzau, Jean and Jacques, are two brothers who have quarrelled over their father's will because it made Jean richer than Jacques. The difference amounts to something like a thatched cottage and a potato-field. By way of contrast to the hatred of the two brothers, we have the love of their two children, Georges and Louise, a love of whose existence the spectator is informed by the deus ex machina of the piece, the schoolmaster Florence. Finally, in order to make their children happy, the two brothers become reconciled and the curtain falls. The defect of the piece is that the authors have passed by the side of the interesting situations, and concentrated what interest there is in the piece on the paltry family quarrel of two Alsatian village magnates. The piece was saved purely by the splendid acting of Got, Coquelin, Worms, and Mdlle. Bartet, and by the admirable mise-en-scène.

In order to make up for the dulness of previous weeks, there has been a plethora of duels and of projected duels during the past few days. M. Périvier, of the Figaro, sent out three challenges to three colleagues who had given vent to their esprit gaulois on the subject of a disaster that recently befell him. One adversary, M. Cornély, of the Clairon, replied, and pistol shots were exchanged without result on the Belgian frontier yesterday. M. Joseph Reinach has been endeavouring to induce Rochefort to fight; but Rochefort has reminded the friend of Gambetta that he himself challenged him last year without result. Two deputies, MM. Rémouille and Dreyfus, have likewise tried in vain to show cause why they should become each a target for the other; and, besides these cases, there are at least half a dozen duels brewing. Nowadays, duelling is an acknowledged means of getting notoriety, which the present code of honour renders as innocuous as zedone or ginger-pop.

M. Sully-Prudhomme was received with due solemnity at the French Academy last Thursday. His speech was not brilliant. It is true that his subject, the panegyric of the parliamentarian Duvergier-d'Hauranne, was not calculated to inspire a philosophic poet of the calibre of Sully-Prudhomme. What a melancholy creature he is, too, M. Sully-Prudhomme! Some of his poems are very fine, quite admirable; but what a distillation of sadness, what an exposition of the burden of human sorrow! M. Maxime du Camp replied with that heaviness, self-sufficiency, and want of grace which characterise the historian of the Commune. M. du Camp, I may add, has just published the first volume of his "Souvenirs Littéraires" (Hachette et Cie). It contains some interesting reminiscences of Gustave Flaubert, and states some sad facts, which will be new to most of Flaubert's admirers; amongst other, the fact that the author of "Madame Bovary" was struck with epilepsy in his twenty-second year, and remained subject to violent fits for the rest of his life. This, says M. du Camp, is the explanation of the eccentricities of Flaubert and of the stationariness of his talent.

For the benefit of those who are interested in French theatrical affairs, I mention the appearance of the "Histoire du Second Théâtre Français," two volumes, in which MM. Porel and Monval have related with an abundance of anecdote the history of the Odéon, and of the publication of the "Mémoires" of Samson, the celebrated actor of the Comédie Française.

Saturday was the last day for sending in pictures to the Salon. It appears that upwards of 7000 canvases have been sent in, out of which the jury will have to choose 3000. When one thinks of the number of pictures that are now exhibited in private galleries and clubs and provincial exhibitions, one remains stupefied at the immense production of modern pictorial art, and powerless to imagine what becomes of these acres of canvas. There is no end to picture exhibitions; and, when they are really good, duty requires one to mention them at least. Such is the case with the exhibition of some fifty landscapes by the Italian painter Rossano, now open at 43, Boulevard Haussmann. It contains some really admirable work, remarkable, in these days of imitators and schools, for its sincerity, individuality, and a sentiment of the poetry of nature.

The Vicomte d'Arnaud, known as Bertall, the celebrated illustrator, died last week, at the age of sixty-two.

In the Chamber last Saturday the bill confirming the Treaty with Belgium was passed by a majority of 399 to 61. There was a stormy sitting in the Chamber yesterday. Mgr. Freppel asked the Government in virtue of what law forty citizens had been expelled from their common domicile. The citizens in question are the Benedictines of Solesmes, whom M. de Freycinet has recently dispersed. The discussion was hot; and finally, the question having been changed into an interpellation, an order of the day approving the conduct of the Ministry was passed by 418 votes against 73. The Benedictines were, doubtless, harmless enough; still the Government is bound to execute the existing laws, even if they do seem unjust to Bishop Freppel and his friends.

Some few weeks ago the deputies voted for themselves the privilege of travelling by all the French railways for 125*f.* a year. These famous "cartes de circulation," which have given rise to so many pleasantries of late, were distributed to the deputies yesterday, in time for the seaside season.

M. Wilson, son-in-law of President Grévy, has been elected to the chairmanship of the Budget Committee.

The July weather which everybody was enjoying so much has given place to regular March weather, with accompaniment of wind, sleet, and rain-showers. On Sunday Paris was visited by a violent hurricane which blew down the chimney-pots and broke the trees. A large number of accidents to persons are recorded. In the garden of the Tuilleries a middle-aged woman was killed by a falling tree.

Captain William Jefferson, of the steam-ship Caedmon, of Whitby, has been presented with a silver medal and diploma from the King of Portugal, in recognition of his bravery and humanity in rescuing the crew of the schooner Alexander Secundo, in the Bay of Biscay, in October last.

LONGFELLOW.

In the fulness of years, of literary honours, of popularity more than national, equally in Great Britain and in America diffused among ninety millions, counting also our colonists, of English-speaking people—Henry Wadsworth Longfellow has fallen asleep. The sweetest and purest-minded of English poets, not excepting Wordsworth and Tennyson, the most versatile scholar and artist of poetry, the most catholic in sentiment, the most unbounded in human and divine charity, has finished his songs on earth, and soared to the ethereal clime of heaven, fancy would fain conceive, "with all his singing-rob about him." His spirit, congenial with that priceless element of the most refined modern culture, the "enthusiasm of humanity," to which the religion and the philosophy of this day, the Broad Church and the Positivist School, allow so large a scope in the improvement of our social state, has uttered itself in manifold expressions of Love to Man, surely never otherwise inspired than by the Love of God. Less than this high estimate of the characteristic moral purpose of all Longfellow's writings, which are eminently Christian, though sparing of theological doctrine, cannot do justice to his personal worth, or to the affectionate regard in which he has been held, these forty years past, by devout and reverent and compassionate disciples of the consoling faith of Christendom. It is as truly the case with this mere man of letters, as with one of the ecclesiastical profession such as the late Arthur Stanley, whose tone of mind had some affinities of sympathy with that of Longfellow, that their labours were consecrated to the supreme service of that greatest of the Three Christian Graces, which "beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things;" Charity, which "never faileth."

Nearly thirteen years have passed since the Portrait of Longfellow, which is republished this day, appeared in our Journal, accompanied by some critical appreciation of his genius and its productions, which a leading American contemporary thought worth copying without alteration. It was then observed by us—and the Americans seemed to assent to the observation—that Longfellow's popularity in England was probably greater than among his own countrymen in the United States. In this country, we could testify, he is literally the poet of the million; and "finds a place on shelf or table in the humblest artisan's home, where Tennyson and Browning have not yet come." We ventured to suppose that in America this was not quite so much the case; but that he was there regarded more as a consummate literary scholar and artist, the cherished companion of readers of cultivated taste. Longfellow is amply deserving of acceptance, both as a genuine poet speaking to the heart through the imagination, and as an accomplished practitioner of exquisite forms of metrical eloquence, a learned master of the chords of intellectual association and the keys to mental emotion. Such a prolific author of poetical compositions, at the same time being such an expert connoisseur, student and translator, of similar productions in many foreign languages, yet preserved the originality and spontaneity of his own Muse; he was no mocking-bird or parrot. But this was due, in our judgment, to his moral freedom from the vices of insincerity and affectation; it was because he always wrote direct from the heart, and direct to the heart of his English-hearted readers. Can the same be said of certain poets endowed with greater imaginative powers—for instance, of Byron, whose mental force was far superior, but whose spirit was sadly awry and alienated from the wholesome interests of honest human life? We do not affirm that only a good man, temperate, benevolent, and pious, can be a very grand poet; the most illustrious examples are rather the other way. But to be a great Poet of the People, it is needful that he should be a lover of mankind.

We all know "The Village Blacksmith," which is not of the finest quality of poetry, but is a fair specimen of the genuine popular poet's work; "creating and impressing for ever," it was said, "upon that memory of the heart which is called imagination, some true type of our common humanity, in the recognition of which we feel 'the whole world kin.'" Who cannot sympathise with the Blacksmith? We see him bravely standing at his forge, "week in, week out, from morn till night;" and, with his heavy hammer, beating on the anvil, in a storm of sound and flame and flying sparks, to shape the work of his life:—

His brow is wet with honest sweat,
He earns what'er he can;
And looks the whole world in the face,
For he owes not any man!

We see him, again, on the Sunday morning, in the gallery at church, with his boys; "he hears the parson pray and preach," but he also hears his little daughter in the choir, "singing with her mother's voice;" and the Blacksmith's hard rough hand wipes a tear of sweet sorrow from his honest eyes:—

Toiling, rejoicing, sorrowing,
Onward through life he goes;
Each morn'ning sees some task begun,
Each evening sees it close;
Something attempted, something done,
Has earned the night's repose!

That is the Village Blacksmith; and to hear this song well sung is worth many a sermon; it has made many a man to feel himself a stronger, better, happier man than he was before. This is a piece of "real and earnest" human life, set forth in the true way of poetry, by an imaginative appeal to our sympathy, which is very much more potent than the way of "The Psalm of Life," a comparatively feeble production of the same author, enunciating such truisms as that "Life is real, Life is earnest." Show us rather, if you be a poet, what life is and how it feels, by the use either of dramatic exhibition or of lyrical expression of its motives and its natural affections! Longfellow could do this, but more efficiently in the lyrical than in the dramatic method; bear witness, again, that most touching lyrical piece, "The Bridge at Midnight," which many of our readers know by heart. Yet we are tempted to quote it once more, with its pathetic reminiscence, "how often, oh! how often," of despondent and despairing thoughts in past moments while loitering on the lonely bridge, till the season of sorrow was over:—

And I think how many thousands
Of care-cumbered men,
Each bearing his burden of sorrow,
Have crossed the bridge since then,
I see the long procession,
Still passing to and fro,
The young heart hot and restless,
And the old subdued and slow,
And for ever and for ever,
As long as the river flows,
As long as the heart has passions,
As long as life has woes—

The stress of feeling is too intense in this concluding passage of the song; we have heard the voice of a singer or reciter break down with a sob, and we have seen the silent fall of a tear; such is the poet's power.

Anything like a critical description, or even a bare enumeration, of the multifarious poetical works of Longfellow, besides several graceful stories and sketches in prose, must be sought elsewhere than in this hasty notice. We have not leisure or space here to point out the merits of any of his principal narrative compositions in different forms of verse; the North American Indian romance of "Hiawatha;" the tender, gracious, pathetic tale of "Evangeline," which many prefer; the "Courtship of Miles Standish," the "New England Tragedies," and other poems, on subjects of American history; the "Golden Legend," which will bear comparison, in some qualities, with Goethe's "Faust;" and the collections of shorter pieces, entitled "Birds of Passage," "By the Seaside," "By the Fireside," and "Tales of a Wayside Inn." There are some others of more recent date, which have been noticed as they appeared in publication. All will be preserved and cherished that Henry Wadsworth Longfellow wrote. Since he resigned, in 1854, the Professorship of Modern Languages and Literature at Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, he has dwelt in rural retirement, a widower, but with affectionate daughters at home. At the fine old age of seventy-five, he died on Sunday last; and few writers have been more deserving of the love of young and old, in their day and generation.

A handsome brass tablet has been placed in the parish church of Shrivensham, Berks, by Viscount Barrington, to the memory of the Earl of Beaconsfield.

There will be a service at the Temple Church on Good Friday evening at seven o'clock, when the Master of the Temple, the Very Rev. Dr. Vaughan will preach. The usual orders of admission will not be necessary on this occasion.

The company appointed for the revision of the authorised version of the Old Testament finished their seventy-fourth session yesterday, in the Jerusalem Chamber. The second revision of the prophetic books was continued as far as the end of Ezekiel xviii.

The Rev. Edward Symonds has been presented by the parishioners of Christ Church, St. Leonard's, diocese of Sydney, New South Wales, with a purse of two hundred and five sovereigns on his resignation of the incumbency for a visit to Europe, after eighteen years' service in Australia and Tasmania.

Two memorial windows have been placed in St. Matthew's Church, Sydenham, by Messrs. J. C. and F. Hardy and the Misses Hardy. One represents the call of St. Andrew and St. Peter, and the other the raising of Peter's wife's mother. There has also been added to this church an elaborately finished altar frontal with designs commemorative of the preaching of St. John the Baptist.

A Memorial of the late General Sir Richard Waddy has been placed in Canterbury Cathedral. It is in the form of a tablet bearing the following inscription:—"In memory of General Sir Richard Waddy, K.C.B., who died at Kingstown, Ireland, July 9, 1881. This tablet was erected by many of the officers who formerly served with him in the 50th (Queen's Own) Regiment, as a token of esteem and affection, and as a memorial to his long and distinguished services in that regiment during thirty-six years."

A special service will be held in the choir of Westminster Abbey on Wednesday next at 7.30 p.m., at which Dr. Bridge's oratorio, "Mount Moriah," will be rendered, with full orchestra. The entrance for the public, by the north door in St. Margaret's churchyard, will be opened at seven o'clock. It is requested that no applications be made for tickets for reserved seats. A collection will be made at the close of the service, the balance of which, after payment of necessary expenses, will be devoted to the Westminster Hospital.

The governors of Queen Anne's Bounty Corporation held their annual meeting last week for the distribution of their surplus income for the past year in the augmentation of benefices not exceeding in value £200 per annum. By the rules and orders contained in their charters and Royal sign manuals the governors are enabled to make grants to such benefices on behalf of which benefactors in order to obtain grants will give £200 or more in money, or the value thereof in land, tithes, or other real estate. In accordance with these regulations they have this year promised grants amounting in the aggregate to £24,800 on condition that the benefactions offered to obtain them be duly completed, the value of such benefactions being estimated at £28,030. The total capital sum thus secured as an addition to the property of the Church is £52,830; being £36,730 in augmentation of endowments, and £16,100 towards providing or enlarging parsonage houses.

A Fine-Art Exhibition will be held at St. Jude's Schools, Commercial-street, Whitechapel, from April 4 to April 16. The exhibition, which will be opened by Mr. Leonard Courtney, M.P., next Tuesday, will include pictures by T. Fied, R.A.; E. W. Cooke, R.A.; Josef Israels, Professor Richmond; H. S. Marks, R.A.; E. Long, R.A.; and many others.

A letter has been received by the London School Board stating that the Court of Assistants of the Drapers' Company will place at the disposal of the board for competition during the present year four scholarships, each of the average value of £30 per annum, and tenable for four years. The Court of Assistants of the company has voted twenty guineas to the fund for meeting the expenses of the examinations for the scholarships held by the board. A letter has been received from Mrs. Watson, widow of Mr. Watson, one of the original members of the board, expressing a wish that the scholarship bearing her husband's name should be increased to a first-class scholarship. The amount necessary to comply with the wish is £212, and a cheque for that amount has been received.

THE UNIVERSITY BOAT-RACE: SKETCHES TAKEN LAST YEAR.

ATTRACTIONS OF THE BOAT-RACE.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

THE COURT.

Her Majesty's home life at Mentone has been most pleasurable, nothing having tended to disturb the quiet or the freedom of action desired. Daily walks and drives are taken by the Queen and Princess Beatrice in the picturesque district. Prince Leopold has had an untoward, although slight, fall, through tripping over an ottoman in his dressing-room, which has confined him for some days to his own apartments at the Hôtel Bellevue. Her Majesty often walks to the hotel to see him. His Royal Highness has not suffered in health through the accident. During the fête in honour of the Royal visitors, announced in our last as having been given on the 21st ult., the Queen, with Princess Beatrice and Prince Leopold, viewed from the balcony of the Chalet des Rosiers a beautiful illumination of the East Bay of Mentone, together with fireworks arranged in her honour. The Duke and Duchess of Saxe-Coburg visited her Majesty the next day, being met at the railway station by Princess Beatrice and Prince Leopold. Their Royal Highnesses breakfasted with the Queen. During the day her Majesty visited Mrs. Henfrey at the Hôtel d'Italie; and in the evening the Queen received at the Chalet his Excellency Viscount Lyons, the British Ambassador to the French Republic. Yesterday week her Majesty and Princess Beatrice paid a visit to the King and Queen of Saxony at the Hôtel des Îles Britanniques; and also inspected the Poterie Artistique de Monsieur Maynat, her Majesty making various purchases. General Ponsonby entertained at luncheon, at the Hôtel des Anglais last Saturday, Lord Lyons and the Secretaries of the British Embassy, Lord Bridport, the General in command of the military division in Nice, with his staff, the Prefect of the Alpes Maritimes, the Mayor of Mentone, and the British Vice-Consul. The guests were afterwards presented to her Majesty, Princess Beatrice being present; and they inscribed their names in her Majesty's visiting-book. In the afternoon the Queen and her Royal Highness visited Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Hanbury at the Palazzo Orongo at Mortola, and walked in their gardens. Her Majesty and the Princess attended Divine service, performed on Sunday at the Chalet by the Rev. John Woodroffe, Chaplain of Christ Church, Mentone. Her Majesty witnessed on Monday evening a torchlight procession, organised by the several musical societies which had been competing in an international concert of vocal and instrumental music, at which the Aix Society carried the palm in the former, and the San Remo Society in the latter.

The Inflexible, stationed off Mentone, has left for Villefranche in consequence of the changeable state of the weather. The French Government has placed the Chalet des Rosiers at Mentone in direct telegraphic communication with London, her Majesty's messages having priority over all others.

Her Majesty has recently placed a headstone over the graves of Mr. and Mrs. Warne, in Whippingham churchyard. The inscription, written by her Majesty, is:—"To the respected memory of Thomas Warne, died December 27, 1881, aged 69; and of Louisa Warne, his wife, died September 19, 1881, aged 65, who during 27 years had charge of the Swiss Cottage, Osborne, where they died. This stone was erected by Queen Victoria and her children, January, 1882.—He that is faithful in that which is least is faithful also in much."

A Levee will be held by the Prince of Wales, on behalf of her Majesty, at St. James's Palace, on the 24th inst.

It is gazetted that the Queen's birthday will this year be celebrated in England on June 3. In all other places her Majesty's birthday is to be kept, as usual, on May 24.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales, after their return from visiting the Channel Tunnel Works at Dover last week, dined in the evening with Earl and Countess Granville at their residence on Carlton House-terrace, after which Lady Granville had an early reception. The next day the Prince received numerous gentlemen connected with the Colonial empire, invited by his Royal Highness to meet him at Marlborough House, to consider what steps should be taken to enlist their support in favour of the Royal College of Music as an institution for the benefit of all portions of the empire. Their Royal Highnesses went to the fourth Philharmonic Concert at St. James's Hall in the evening. The Savoy Theatre was patronised by the Prince and Princess yesterday week; and on Saturday his Royal Highness was present at a meeting of the members of the Standing Committee of the British Museum; after which he and the Princess visited the International Electric Exhibition at the Crystal Palace, and dined with the chairman and directors, returning to town by special train. Divine service was attended, as usual, by the Royal family on Sunday. The Prince and Princess inspected Mr. Millais', R.A., and Mr. and Mrs. Jossling's studios on Monday; and dined with the Russian Ambassador at Chesham House. Prince Christian, accompanied by his nephew, Duke Ernest Gunther of Schleswig-Holstein Sonderburg-Augustenburg, lunched with the Prince and Princess on Tuesday. Their Royal Highnesses visited the studios of Sir Frederick Leighton, P.R.A., and Mr. Val Prinsep, R.A., in Holland Park-road. The Prince and Princess went to the Globe Theatre in the evening. On their returning home one of the carriage horses fell, and, kicking the other, that became restive. Happily no accident occurred, and the Princess was placed in the Equerry's carriage by the Prince. The Prince presided at the Festival Dinner given at Willis's Rooms on Wednesday in aid of the funds of the Victoria Hospital for Sick Children.

Their Royal Highnesses will open the new wing of the Metropolitan and City Police Orphanage, at Strawberry-hill, Twickenham, and it is stated they will visit St. David's during the summer.

Princes Albert Victor and George of Wales were present at the British Amateur Athletic Club sports at Alexandria yesterday week, and the next day the Governor and the chief officials of the port went on board the Bacchante, and took leave of their Royal Highnesses, the corvette meantime exchanging salutes with the fort batteries. The Bacchante left for Jaffa at six a.m. on Sunday.

Princess Louise of Lorne, accompanied by the Premier and Mrs. Gladstone, visited Harrow School last Saturday. Her Royal Highness has dined with Lady Molesworth.

The Duke and Duchess of Connaught arrived at Biarritz yesterday week, being received at the station by Consul Bellairs, whose daughter presented to the Duchess a bouquet of wild flowers.

The sixty-third anniversary of the Duke of Cambridge's birthday was observed at Windsor on Sunday by the church bells ringing. His Royal Highness presided at the annual meeting of the friends of the Royal School for Daughters of Officers of the Army on Tuesday at the United Service Institution, Whitehall. On Wednesday the Duke had an inspection at Aldershot.

Marriages are arranged between the Duke of Westminster and the Hon. Catherine Cavendish; between Lord Capell, Grenadier Guards, grandson of the Earl of Essex, and Miss Harford, eldest daughter of William H. Harford, Esq., of Oldown, Almondsbury, Gloucestershire; and between Mr. Douglas Hamilton, only son of Lord Claud Hamilton, and Lady Margaret Hely-Hutchinson, youngest daughter of the late and sister of the present Earl of Donoughmore.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

ITALY.

Nearly all the Bishops and Chapters in the northern and southern provinces of Italy sent telegrams of congratulation to King Humbert on the occasion of his birthday.

Signor Magliani, the Minister of Finance, presented his Budget to the Chamber of Deputies last Saturday. He stated that it would be his policy to reduce the Floating Debt as much as possible, and explained the rules to be observed for continuing the reform of the system of taxation, especially in regard to the taxes on land and on articles of consumption. He gave an assurance that the forced currency would be abolished as soon as the Treasury had obtained a sufficient metallic reserve to withdraw the paper money from circulation.

In a Secret Consistory on Monday the Pope created Archbishop McCabe a Cardinal. On Tuesday the Pope presented the birettas to the five newly-created Cardinals who are at present in Rome—Mgr. Agostini, Dr. McCabe (Archbishop of Dublin), Mgr. Ricci Paracciani, Mgr. Lasagni, and Mgr. Angelo Jacobini (Assessor of the Inquisition).

Mlle. Sarah Bernhardt continues to excite the greatest enthusiasm in Rome, and the theatre has been crowded to suffocation. Queen Margaret was present at the performance of "Frou-Frou," and constantly applauded.

Donizetti's posthumous opera, the "Duca d'Alba," discovered a year ago among his papers, was brought out at the Apollo Theatre at Rome last week. Expectation (the Times correspondent says) had been raised to the highest pitch, and the success of the opera completely justified it. The theatre was crammed in every part; not an inch of standing room remained unoccupied, even in the boxes. Not only was all the musical world present, but a number of art notabilities came from Milan, Naples, and other cities. Among them were the Maestri Ponchielli, Bazzini, and Dominetti, who formed the commission appointed by the Academic Council of the Milan Conservatoire to pronounce on the authenticity of the manuscript, and the Maestro Salvi, who undertook the task of completing the music for the stage. All the aristocracies, rank, wealth, talent, science, and art were represented, with Queen Margherita, who is never absent whenever honour is to be rendered to the Italian name. The audience remained silent during the first half of the first act; but the applause burst forth at a splendid chorus, and then continued with increasing intensity to the end. At some parts the audience actually shouted their approval.

GERMANY.

The Emperor, as usual, has addressed a communication to the Chancellor desiring him to make known to all and sundry his Majesty's high appreciation of the universal and devoted way in which his eighty-sixth birthday was lately celebrated. "From such a hearty display of loyalty," he says, "I derive fresh courage and confidence for the further performance of the duties of my responsible position, and for devoting my continual care, as long as God gives me strength, to the welfare of my people." The reply of the Emperor William to the birthday congratulations of the Russian Emperor is very cordial, and reciprocates the peaceful wishes of the Czar.

Prince Henry of Prussia, the second son of the Crown Prince, will return home in May. He is apparently greatly strengthened in health, and intends to resume his duties in the naval profession.

The Sultan has conferred the Order of the Medjidie of the first class on Marshal Moltke in acknowledgment of the Marshal's former services in Turkey.

Prince Bismarck, accompanied by his wife and younger son, with one or two secretaries, left Berlin last Saturday for Friedrichsruhe, in Lauenburg, where his Highness will spend his Easter holidays and return to town when the Imperial Parliament reassembles.

In yesterday week's sitting of the Lower House of the Prussian Diet the debate on the second reading of the Budget was continued. The proposal of the Government for a remission of taxation was agreed to, and the remainder of the Budget, together with the Financial Law, was adopted in accordance with the report of the committee. On Monday the Upper Chamber approved without debate the bill for nationalising the six remaining private railways in the monarchy. In the Lower House the Budget passed the third reading.

SWEDEN AND NORWAY.

The Swedish Budget demands about nineteen millions of crowns for the Army and nine millions for the Navy.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

An autograph letter of the Emperor was officially published on Tuesday, summoning the Delegations to meet in Vienna on April 15 for an extraordinary session.

The Grand Duke and Duchess Vladimir of Russia, who left St. Petersburg on a foreign tour last Saturday, arrived at Vienna on Sunday. They were received by the Emperor of Austria at the railway station, and accompanied to the Hofburg by his Majesty. A Court dinner has been given in honour of the Grand Duke, and he is being everywhere treated with the most marked attention and consideration. The Duke and Duchess left on Wednesday for Rome.

The Reichsrath in Vienna have adopted the provisional commercial treaty with France, and have ratified the commercial treaty and certain conventions with Servia. The Reichsrath has passed the second reading of the Electoral Reform Bill unamended. On Tuesday the Government presented to the Lower House a bill for placing the Bohemia-Moravia Transversal Railway in a proper state of repair. The House adjourned until April 18. The Upper House passed the Budget and Financial Law for 1882, and resolved to refer the Electoral Law Amendment Bill to a committee of 15. The election of this committee as well as that of the Customs Committee, also to consist of fifteen members, was to take place on Thursday.

The Lower House of the Hungarian Diet has adopted, by 199 against 113 votes, the Army Law Amendment Bill.

The Vienna apiculturists will hold an International Exhibition of live bees, honey, wax, hives, and all other objects relating to bee-culture, on April 8-15. Most European as well as Trans-oceanic countries will be represented. This is the first exhibition of the kind in Vienna.

GREECE.

The infant son of the King and Queen of the Hellenes was baptised on Monday morning in the palace by the name of Andrew. The sponsors, all of whom were represented by Prince Constantine, the Heir Apparent, were the Empress of Russia, the Prince of Wales, the Queen and Crown Prince of Denmark, the Grand Duchess Constantine, and the Grand Dukes Sergius and Vladimir of Russia.

The Chamber of Deputies, after several days' debate, adopted on Tuesday by a large majority the Ministerial bill for the assimilation of the laws in the new provinces to those of the rest of the kingdom. The Budget was to be submitted to the Chamber on Thursday.

EGYPT.

On Sunday morning the Chamber was prorogued by Mahmoud Pasha Baroudi. All the Ministers were present.

The monthly statement of the Public Debt shows that the next coupons are provided for, leaving a considerable surplus.

AMERICA.

The House of Representatives has passed the Chinese Immigration Bill by 167 to 65.

Mr. Longfellow died yesterday week at Cambridge, near Boston, aged seventy-five. His death is sincerely mourned all over the States. The remains of the poet were interred on Sunday in Mount Auburn Cemetery, Cambridge, after religious services in his residence and in the chapel of Harvard College. The entire town was in mourning. Telegrams of condolence have been received by the family from all parts of the world. A portrait and a memoir of Longfellow are given in the present issue.

The Judge Advocate-General has decided that the proceedings of the court-martial which condemned Sergeant Mason for shooting at Guitau are invalid.

Eleven persons have been killed by an explosion in the Vulcan Powder Manufactory in San Francisco.

Three persons were killed, and damage caused to property to the extent of 500,000 dol., by a fire in Richmond, State of Virginia, the other day. Several tobacco factories, as well as flour mills, were destroyed.

The Times correspondent at Philadelphia says that the amount of immigration this year outstrips that of last year, large as it was. No less than 43,646 immigrants had arrived in New York to the 23rd ult., being 13,795 increase on last year.

A violent hurricane prevailed on Monday in various parts of the States, and was felt with especial severity in some portions of Ohio, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Georgia, and Louisiana.

CANADA.

In the Dominion House of Commons last week the bill legalising marriage with a deceased wife's sister passed the third reading.

The Canadian Pacific Railway has entered into a contract for the completion of 600 miles during this season of the main line to the foot of the Rocky Mountains.

In Tuesday's sitting of the Legislative Assembly of British Columbia the report of the Dry Dock Committee was brought up. The report condemns the action of the Government in the matter on the ground of want of business capacity and of reckless expenditure. The Premier, in reply, made a violent attack upon the chairman of the committee. A change of Government is considered probable.

The annual meeting of the Dominion Rifle Association was held at Ottawa on the 1st ult. The affairs of the association are in a most satisfactory condition.

Preparations are being made for the reception of a large immigration in the different parts of Canada during the coming season. The supplementary estimates recently presented to the Canadian Parliament by the Finance Minister include 90,000 dol. for immigration buildings at Winnipeg, Emerson, and Brandon.

SOUTH AFRICA.

In the Cape Parliament on Monday the Colonial Secretary announced that the Government proposed to repeal the proclamation for the disarmament of the Basutos, and to appoint a Commission to investigate the grievances of the loyal Basutos, and to consider what system of administration would be best adapted to the requirements of the country.

Emigration from Switzerland is proceeding this year on a greater scale than ever.

Intelligence from San Domingo, of the 10th ult., states that Dr. Fernando Arturo de Merino, the President of the Republic, when returning from a tour was fired at near the capital by some men lying in ambush. He escaped unhurt, and ten arrests were made.

From Teheran come reports of a Russian caravan having arrived at Merv from Askabad. It was also said that an officer had been dispatched from the latter place with presents from the Merv chiefs. Of the four parties into which the Tekke Turkomans are divided, two have submitted to the Russians, another party is wavering, and the fourth is settling in Persian territory.

NEW CALORIC ENGINE.

The Morning Post of Wednesday had an article on Mr. Buckett's Caloric Engine, a novel motive power, from which we take the following extract:—

To the undeveloped energy of force the application of science is now turned, and thoughtful people are beginning to ask why there should be such an enormous consumption of fuel to obtain very limited results. The average of steam-engines (fed in the usual manner) do not give forth more than one twenty-fifth of the energy which may be taken as residing in the fuel they consume. Some motor, therefore, that can utilise the virtue of the fuel without the cost and danger of generating steam is clearly what is wanted, and this necessity was pointed out by Sir Frederick J. Bramwell, F.R.S., in his last address to the Society of Arts. It would seem that in the caloric engine these requirements are fully met. It has frequently been proposed to use heated air as a means of producing power, but the attempts made have, up till now, only resulted in the production of motors of trifling power, with an expenditure of fuel as great as that for the steam engine. The chief cause of failure is due to the fact that the bulk of the heat-giving properties of the fuel was allowed to escape up the chimney, the air used for operating the engine being heated merely by contact with a hot surface. Mr. Buckett has invented a caloric engine which appears destined to supersede both the steam engine and gas engine. By this invention the same air which is used to operate the engine is that which has been previously passed through the fire and produced combustion of the fuel. Compared with the gas engine the caloric engine can be worked at a saving of 75 per cent. The caloric engine cannot explode; no boiler is required; and there are no smoke, steam, gas, or water-pipe connections. There being no open fire, stoking is unnecessary, and the machine requires no skilled attendance. The engine is suitable for tram-cars and almost every other purpose to which steam and gas engines are now applicable; while its steadiness makes it peculiarly suitable for the generation of electric light. Another great advantage of the caloric engine is that it can be kept going for almost an indefinite time without repair. It has been manufactured for some time by Mr. Buckett, at his works in Southwark, where those interested in the development of this novel motive power can see it in full operation. It is also proposed to utilise the engine in connection with Professor Frederick Hale Holmes's well-known "Siren Fog-Signals," and a limited liability company, of which Sir William Hewett, V.C., is the chairman, has been started to manufacture the caloric engine and the siren fog apparatus.

INSURGENTS RETIRING WITH THEIR WOUNDED AND DEAD COMRADES TOWARDS THE MONTENEGRIN FRONTIER.

INSPECTING THE AMMUNITION OF AN AUSTRIAN REGIMENT AT CATTARO.

THE LATE COMMANDER SELBY, R.N.

The untimely death of this gallant officer, by the injuries which he suffered at the hands of a party of Albanians, near Artaki, on the southern shore of the Sea of Marmora, has excited a general feeling of regret. He was in command of H.M.S. Falcon, which lay at anchor on that part of the Asiatic coast below Constantinople; and he had gone ashore that day, in company with Captain Grenfell, Commander of H.M.S. Cockatrice, and Mr. Wrench, the British Consul, to enjoy the sport of shooting. A misunderstanding arose with the Albanians, who were tending sheep in the country, Mr. Wrench being at the moment out of the way, and Captains Selby and Grenfell not being able to speak Turkish. The behaviour of the two British naval officers was perfectly inoffensive, and they did not know what it was that excited the anger of their assailants; Commander Selby had actually laid down his gun on the ground, to show that he had no hostile intention, and the gun was seized by one of the Albanians, who numbered fifteen altogether. When attacked by so many, armed with knives and axes, the two Englishmen defended themselves as well as they could, till Consul Wrench came up and spoke to the Albanians, whom he persuaded to desist from their savage violence. But Commander Selby, whose skull had been fractured by the blow of an axe, died soon after his removal to Constantinople.

We give a portrait of Commander William Henry Collingwood Selby, who was born in 1842, at Swansfield, Northumberland, the second son of the late Mr. Prideaux Selby, of Pawston, in that county. He entered the service in 1855, and attained the rank of Sub-Lieutenant in January, 1862; Lieutenant in November, 1863; and Commander in March, 1873, when he was promoted from H.M.S. Excellent, the naval gunnery instruction ship at Portsmouth. He commanded Her Majesty's ships Nimble and Vestal on the East Indian station, where he was officially noticed and commended by the Lords of the Admiralty for the efficient discharge of his duties. He was subsequently appointed to command H.M.S. Torch in 1880, and H.M.S. Falcon in 1881. Commander Selby married, in 1872, the youngest daughter of Mr. Robert Clutterbuck, of Watford House, Hertfordshire, by whom he leaves one son and two daughters. The deceased was one of the best known gunnery officers of the Royal Navy, and formerly held the responsible post of senior staff officer on H.M.S. Excellent. He had also received the coveted distinction of a certificate at the Royal Naval College. The photograph was taken by Messrs. Elliott and Fry in 1873.

THE QUEEN ON THE RIVIERA.

Her Majesty and Princess Beatrice continue to enjoy their delightful temporary abode in the Chalet des Rosiers at Mentone; while Prince Leopold, Duke of Albany, who arrived at Mentone on Wednesday week, has unfortunately been disabled from walking by an accidental bruise from a fall. On the previous day, or the Tuesday evening, the Queen and Princess viewed from their residence a beautiful spectacle—the illumination of the East Bay, with a display of fireworks—prepared by the Municipality and townsfolk of Mentone in honour of her Majesty's visit to their neighbourhood. This is the subject of a Sketch by our Correspondent at Mentone; and we also present views of three places in the Italian part of the Riviera, to the east of Mentone, but within a day's excursion. Ventimiglia, called by the French Vintimille, is seven miles from Mentone; Bordighera is ten or eleven; and San Remo is nearly seventeen; but all these small towns are accessible either by the Corniche road or by the railway which runs close to the seashore.

"San Remo and the Western Riviera" is an agreeable and serviceable book published in September, 1879, by Dr. Arthur Hill Hassall, M.D., founder of the Royal National Hospital, in England, for consumption and diseases of the chest. This volume contains an exact description of all the places along the coast, with remarks upon their climate and salubrity, from the medical point of view. The same publishers, Messrs.

ILLUMINATIONS AT MENTONE IN HONOUR OF THE QUEEN'S VISIT.

Longman, Green, and Co., have brought out a second edition of Mr. W. Miller's more discursive and less scientific account of "Wintering in the Riviera."

San Remo is an Italian town of sixteen thousand inhabitants, situated in a bay, four miles wide, bounded to the east by Capo Verde, which is 350 ft. high, and to the west by Capo Nero, or Cap Pin, more than twice that height; the Alpine range of mountains behind the town rises to an elevation of 4270 ft.; and, farther inland, but not within sight, the principal Maritime Alps attain 7000 ft. or 8000 ft., affording great shelter from the north. The town is of great antiquity, and was a free Republic in the thirteenth century, when it bore the name of San Romolo; but it afterwards came under the protection of the powerful Genoese Republic, and in the fifteenth century exchanged its pristine name for that of San Remo. Ventimiglia, standing on a hill at the mouth of the Roja, is a town of about seven thousand people; here is the frontier custom house between France and Italy. Some Roman ruins of temples, baths, and an amphitheatre, show that this was an important station of the Empire on the road to Gaul. The church or cathedral is an elegant building. Not far westward is the Point of Murtola, with Mr. Hanbury's villa and garden, which the Queen has visited. On the promontory stretching to the south, and on its western side in full view of the bay and town of Mentone, is the pleasant village of Bordighera, famed for its groves of stately Oriental palms. The privilege of supplying Rome palm-leaves for the Church Festival of Easter was granted to Bordighera by Pope Sixtus V., as a reward for the enthusiastic action of a sailor from this place, when the Egyptian obelisk in the Piazza of St. Peter's, much bigger and heavier than our Cleopatra's Needle, was being hauled up to an erect position. The Pope's Government had forbidden any of the assembled spectators, on pain of death, to speak a word during this arduous and perilous operation, lest the attention of the engineers and workmen should be disturbed. But the practised eye of the sailor perceived, it is said, that the ropes were about to take fire, chafing under the tremendous strain of 331 tons' weight; he forgot or despised the order of silence, and cried out "Wet the ropes!" by which courageous act of disobedient fidelity he saved the obelisk from ruin, and Rome from a terrible disaster.

A REGIMENTAL PET ANTELOPE.

We have to thank Adjutant Bray, of the second battalion of the Royal Inniskilling Fusiliers (the 108th Regiment), for a sketch, drawn by Mrs. Bray, of the favourite antelope, seven years the pet of that regiment, named "Fan," which was maliciously shot in Ireland a few weeks since, about two miles from Enniskillen. This animal was always wont to accompany the regimental band whenever it played in public. The last occasion was at the funeral of Lieutenant Smith, who was accidentally drowned, in February, in Lough Erne. In the funeral procession Fan walked in front of the band, with her silver collar draped in crape. Colonel M'Cintock, of the fourth battalion, has presented the second battalion with another deer, which is already very tame.

On Monday the Lord Mayor presided over the seventeenth annual meeting of the Middle Class Schools Corporation, which was held at the Mansion House. The Council reported that last year the average attendance of scholars was 1100. A second contribution of £100 has been received from the Clothworkers' Company, and the Drapers' Company have resolved to subscribe annually £100 to the funds. Nearly 500 boys pass from the schools annually into City life.

The polling for the Carnarvon boroughs, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. W. Bulkeley Hughes, took place on Tuesday, when Mr. Love Jones Parry, the Liberal candidate, was returned by 2037 votes as against 596 given to Mr. Sorton Parry, the Independent candidate.—Mr. Charles Thomas Dyke Acland, Liberal, and Mr. John Tremayne, Conservative, were on the same day nominated as candidates for the representation of East Cornwall, the polling being on Friday.

Last week 2559 births and 1827 deaths were registered in London. Allowing for increase of population, the births were 170 below, whereas the deaths exceeded by 37 the average numbers in the corresponding week of the last ten years. The deaths included 13 from smallpox, 46 from measles, 20 from scarlet fever, 19 from diphtheria, 190 from whooping-cough, 1 from typhus fever, 35 from enteric fever, 4 from simple continued fever, 19 from diarrhoea and dysentery, and not one from simple cholera.

The Census of the County and City of Dublin showed that the population is 418,910—namely, 197,740 males and 221,170 females, or 3·4 per cent more than in 1871. The population of Dublin is 249,602, an increase of 3276 on the population of 1871. The thirteen civic districts into which Dublin is divided have a total population of 351,820, showing an increase of 19,702. The religious professions of the people of Dublin are shown as follows:—Roman Catholics, 320,519; Protestant Episcopalians, 80,847; Presbyterians, 7809; Methodists, 3734; all other denominations, 5884; information refused, 117.

At the meeting of the Geographical Society on Monday evening Mr. O'Donovan, the correspondent of the Daily News who was detained in Merv some time since, gave an account of that place and of all the difficulties he had been compelled to surmount, first in getting to Merv, and next in getting back again. He said the place was merely a cluster of huts in an oasis situated in the midst of a great desert. He had been himself for a time the chairman of a triumvirate which governed Merv. He said that the half-million inhabitants of the country round could provide 70,000 expert irregular horsemen, and that Merv, free and independent, was looked upon as a rallying point for the whole of Central Asia, but its conquest would be likely to compel the surrounding tribes to join the conquerors.

Three meetings for benevolent purposes were held on Tuesday, besides several, on previous days, noticed at page 315 in the Supplement. The Duke of Cambridge presided at the annual meeting of the Royal School for Daughters of Officers of the Army. The financial condition of the institution has been greatly improved, and the school is said to be making steady progress in all the purposes for which it was founded.—The annual meeting of the governors and subscribers of the Royal Albert Orphan Asylum was held at the offices of the charity, 18, Newgate-street. The asylum was established in 1864, as a memorial to the late Prince Consort, and receives destitute orphan children from all parts of the United Kingdom. Eight hundred children have already received the benefits of the asylum. The boys are taught trades and other industrial pursuits, whilst the girls are trained as domestic servants. According to the report submitted by the committee, the donations for the year amounted to £1502, subscriptions to £1982, and legacies to £3418—the largest amount received since the foundation of the institution.—The anniversary festival of the City of London Hospital for Diseases of the Chest was held at the Cannon-street Hotel; the Lord Mayor in the chair. The hospital, founded in 1848, had a new wing added in 1871, which has hitherto been closed through lack of funds. It has just been opened with 164 beds, and is now fully occupied. The annual expenditure was £10,000, and the regular subscriptions £3500, leaving about £7000 to be provided. Subscriptions to the amount of £2370 were announced.

Further outrages are reported from Ireland. Mr. Heffernan, the postmaster of Dromkeen, has been waylaid and his skull fractured so badly that his life is in danger. The house of a farmer named Donellan, near Kilimihill, has been fired into. The tenants at Newgrove have been visited by an armed party, who made them take an oath not to pay their rents. A party of armed men were surprised early yesterday week at Dromblane, near Thurles, while attacking the house of a farmer named Ryan, who was suspected of having paid his rent. They had wrecked the windows and discharged several shots when they were fired on by a police patrol in ambush and one of them wounded. The others fled. The injured man, John Dyer, is the son of a farmer at Mealiffe. He is reported to be fatally wounded. Two daring attempts to blow up houses with dynamite are reported. A heavy charge of dynamite was placed against the house of Mr. Mulon, agent to Lord Clonbrock, in county Galway, on Sunday night, and on its being fired a wall was blown down, and the windows of the house were shattered. Happily, the family were absent from the premises. A similar attempt was made early on Monday morning to blow up a farm-house occupied by brothers named Lucas, at Letterkenny, the house being partly wrecked, and the inmates owing their escape from injury to the fact that they were sleeping at the back part of the premises. A reward of £500 is offered by the Lord Lieutenant for information leading to the conviction of the person or persons who fired at Messrs. Carter and Froome at Belmullet on the 15th inst. The Rev. Thomas Feehan was sentenced at Maryborough, Queen's County, last Saturday, to six months' imprisonment by Mr. Blake, R.M., for using language calculated to provoke a breach of the peace.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

Honourable members, strangers in the Gallery, ladies in the bird-cage, high above the Speaker's Chair—the First Gentleman Commoner himself, not there presiding, but still arrayed in wig and gown and judicial dignity, while the active Chairman of Committees of the Whole House, Dr. Lyon Playfair, conducts the order of business—the typical spouter, the typical dozer and slumberer, and the diner-out "coming up fresh," at half past ten o'clock, to cry "yah, yah," through speeches of the opposite party—the vociferous declaimer, long past midnight, appealing to the souls of patriotic gentlemen whose weary bodies have fallen asleep—the insidious and unscrupulous "counter-out," when the House, with dwindling numbers, has still important work to do—and the last man to leave the House, at the adjournment of its sitting, when the cry "Who goes home?" is heard through all but empty halls and lobbies—these diverse characteristic figures, whom belated procedure in the House of Commons frequently brings to view, are portrayed in a page of our Artist's unflattering Sketches. The flesh is weak, however willing to serve their country till daybreak may be the spirits of elected legislators; and it is sad to think of sittings prolonged when all the wise and good, except poicemen, reporters, and printers of the morning newspaper, should be snugly and safely in bed. Those two young ladies, "waiting for Papa," would rather be spending these nocturnal hours in the ball-room; but they need not be here unless it had pleased them to bring the carriage round by Westminster, before driving home from the Opera to the far West-End, hoping to pick up their respected sire in proper time for conveying him to domestic repose. We are pained to think of the anxiety of his faithful spouse, who has been persuaded to leave the girls here under Papa's guardianship, positively for not more than half an hour, and who is now sitting up for them at Palaver-gardens, South Kensington, sorely regretting the loss of wholesome rest.

A meeting of the leading members of the medical profession and of the principal scientific men of the day was held on Tuesday at the College of Physicians, to form an association for the advancement of medical research. Sir William Jenner, who presided, explained that the association would be founded on a wide basis, and would comprehend research in medicine, in therapeutics, in the effect of sewer gases, and kindred subjects. Resolutions to establish the society, and framing its institution, were proposed by the Master of the Rolls, the President of the Royal Society, Sir James Paget, Dr. Quain, and others, and were passed unanimously.

THE SHARE LIST WILL CLOSE FOR TOWN AND COUNTRY ON WEDNESDAY NEXT, APRIL 5.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.
This Company has been formed to acquire the established business, the fireproof works in Southwark, and the various English and foreign patents of Professor Holmes and Mr. J. Buckett, for the Caloric Engines and well-known "Siren" Foghorn signalling Apparatus, with the latest improvements, from which considerable profits have been and are being made at the present time.
The Caloric Engines have been sold to foreign Governments, corporate bodies, &c., to the extent of upwards of £20,000, and having been thoroughly tried and found to give complete satisfaction, it has been determined to manufacture them on a large scale, in order to introduce them to the public in sizes suitable for the general purpose of manufacture and others.

As the "Buckett" Caloric Engine, compared with the gas-engine, can be worked at a saving of nearly 75 per cent, the Directors feel justified in anticipating its rapid and general adoption.
From the manufacture and sale of these engines a very large revenue is expected. The Directors fully anticipate that this branch of the business will produce alone an income sufficient to pay a handsome dividend on the share capital; but, irrespective of this, the acquisition by the Company of the "Siren" Foghorn Patents offers such scope for the employment of their capital, that it is difficult to estimate the extent of the probable business.

The value of the well-known "Siren" foghorns of Professor Holmes is now fully recognised, the system being the only successful one extant, having been thoroughly tried by various Governments and corporate bodies with the most complete success. Contracts have just been completed for the Russian Government from whom additional orders to a large extent are expected; whilst the New South Wales, the Norwegian, and the Belgian Governments are in treaty for apparatus to the value of many thousands of pounds.

The "Siren," after searching trials conducted under the direction of the Captain of H.M.S. Excellent, is now officially adopted by the Admiralty for use on her Majesty's ships, and will doubtless be applied throughout the service.

Contracts have within the past few days been completed with the Corporation of the Trinity House and with the Commissioners of Northern Lights for a license to use the "Siren" on all their stations, at a royalty of £40 for every station at which it is used. These stations exceed 20 in number.

The leading public journals have fully tested the value of these inventions, as will be seen by the editorial Press notices accompanying the Prospectus.
The following are some of the leading customers for Caloric Engines and "Sirens," from whom orders have been executed to the value of upwards of £20,000.
The Lord Commissioners of the Admiralty. The Russian Government.
The Honourable Corporation of the Trinity House. The Danish Government.
The Commissioners of Northern Lights. The Austrian Government.
The Commissioners of Irish Lights. The Dutch Government.
The Mersey Dock and Harbour Board. The Canadian Government.
The Chinese Government.

Applications for shares may be made by letter, addressed to the Secretary at the Offices of the Company, where Prospectuses and Forms of Application may be had, or to the Bankers.

Where no allotment is made, the deposit will be returned in full.

THE CALORIC ENGINE AND "SIREN" FOG SIGNALS COMPANY, LIMITED.

FORM OF APPLICATION FOR SHARES.
To the Directors of the Caloric Engine and "Siren" Fog Signals Company, Limited.
Gentlemen,—Having paid to your credit at Messrs. Brown, Janion, and Co. the sum of £1, being a deposit of £1 per share on the above Company, I hereby request you to allot me that number of shares, and I agree to accept the same, or any less number that may be allotted to me, subject to the Memorandum and Articles of Association, and to pay the sum of £3 per share on allotment, and the further calls as they may be made, in accordance with the terms of the prospectus, and I request that my name may be placed upon the Register of Members in respect to the shares so allotted.

SPRING EXHIBITIONS.

FRENCH GALLERY.

The spring exhibitions seem to come upon us this year with a burst, and unawares. It is true that the Dudley Gallery, like an early harbinger of spring, came with its rather immature products some weeks back, and there have been two or three minor shows since; but on Saturday last there were no less than four "private views," two at least being of importance, and inviting us in the aggregate to inspect over 1200 pictures, to say nothing of scores of studios whose doors were open that day and the next ("picture Sunday") to afford a pre-private view of works destined for the Royal Academy and the Grosvenor Gallery! But surely it is impolitic to provide so surfeiting a feast for one day. The committee and managers of the several galleries would assuredly have consulted the convenience of the public, and therefore their own interest, in making these private views fall on successive weeks—not to speak of the impossible task they impose on the art-critic. The art-critic may pretend to be infallible; but he is mortal after all: he has not the eyes of Argus to see with, nor the hands of Briareus to write withal, nor, bark he ever so fiercely, has he the throats of Cerberus.

For our part, we cannot pretend to offer more than general impressions of all that we conscientiously examined—so far as aching head and eye-balls and spine would permit—in order to prepare this article. Into those impressions some comparisons inevitably entered; and, as those comparisons were the reverse of flattering to our insular prejudices, the folly of challenging them by the simultaneous opening of these exhibitions is the more apparent. It so happens that the display at the French gallery is the best we remember to have seen there for years, but that at the Society of British Artists seems to be below the recent level. The society evidently suffers under the strain of providing two exhibitions in the year. To render the comparison a fair one weighty considerations have, of course, to be borne in mind; for while in the one we have very few productions by our leading English artists, in the other we have the fine fleur of several Continental schools. After all due deductions, however, the comparative absence of training in all the higher branches of art education is still painfully apparent among the rank and file of English painters. As for the two exhibitions at Mr. McLean's and Messrs. Tooth's—both of which appear to be below the average, and contain little to repay critical examination—we were chiefly struck with the unworthy character of several of the "pot-boilers" which certain popular English artists supply to dealers, and through them to a too indulgent public.

In attempting a survey in some detail of the mass of works awaiting notice we commence with the display at the French Gallery, Pall-mall—an exceptionally good one as already intimated. A picture by Professor L. C. Müller—"An Almée's Admirers"—again deservedly occupies a post of honour. A dancing-girl is performing the undulating movements of an Eastern dance, arms and feet and lissom body acting in slow cadence to the monotonous thumping and scraping of very primitive musical instruments, in the midst of a circle of Egyptians, Arabs, Nubians, and other of the mixed races of Egypt. The wealth of character in the heads of the motley crowd of spectators—hideous enough in several instances, it must be confessed, as they leer and grin their admiration under the blinding sunlight, is most powerfully rendered; and equally so the incidence of the strong cast shadows, yet without hardness. The colouring is superb throughout. Extremely broad in effect, yet complete in every detail, it would be difficult to find a technical shortcoming in this very masterly work. "An Arab Home," by the same, shows a squalid barn-like interior, shared, with the human inmates, by a number of pigeons—like the Irishmen and his pigs or the Italian peasant and his chickens or goats—and calculated to disillusion those who regard everything Oriental as romantic. The chiaroscuro of this interior is fully as fine in its way as the sunlight effects of the other picture.

Another work of great mark is Bastien Lepage's "Mendicant," from the Paris Salon—a full-length, lifesize, or nearly lifesize, figure of an old beggar turning from a cottage door with a crust of bread, received from a little girl, that he is thrusting into his wallet. To the sordid aspect of this tattered, grizzled outcast, with misery marked in every lineament, as a fitting subject for pictorial representation, objections may be made such as are raised to the characters of Zola's novels; but to us the figure is intensely pathetic, while the wonderful veracity with which the face and hands are given place the work in the very first rank as realistic art. The grey tone of the colouring finds a pleasant echo in the remarkable frame, with its ornament of natural branches and leaves of ivy preserved by oxydised deposit. Another work, by E. Buland, is very noticeable for its original treatment of a subject trite enough, at least in ancient art—that of the "Annunciation." This, though relating to the opposite pole of imaginative sacred art, is also naturalistic as regards the Virgin, who, as she kneels, her eyes closed and her hands groping as in a trance, with white raiment and star-spangled veil, might be a modern French girl at her first communion. But the announcing angel is conventional, and loses in interest proportionately. And to the white hazy "scumble" that seems to cover the whole representation, though imaginative and of obvious intention, it will be difficult for a colour-loving eye to reconcile itself. Jules Breton, in "The End of the Day" (25)—three girls returning from hoeing and other field labour—is true to himself in the unsophisticated record of French peasant life, which yet is grand in sentiment and noble in its mode of expression. His prominent pupil, P. Billet, is also represented. By Dargelas, Paul Seignac, and others of the Ecumen school, there are pretty pleasing pictures of child-life; but the school appears to be declining with the decline of its leading spirit, Edouard Frère. Some of the "past masters" of the French school are also represented, such as Corot, including his lovely "Idyll," so exquisitely etched by Brunet-Debains, Diaz, C. Jacque, &c. A Maignan's picture (53) of the blind Admiral Carlo Zeno led by his granddaughter to embrace the trophy of his ancient victories in the vestibule of St. Mark's is effective, but rather showy and conventional. A small example of Berne-Bellecour (59); another of E. Feyen (46), somewhat photographic in its blackness and precision; a figure of a girl by E. Hublin (52), a picture by Laugée (171), and good examples of artists of various nationalities identified with the French school—such as Schreyer (8), Van Marcke (151), Pasini, and others—likewise deserve mention. The French school, it will be seen, is in rather greater force this year—decidedly to the advantage of the exhibition.

The German and Scandinavian schools are still, however, largely laid under contribution. After the works of Professor Müller, already noticed, the most prominent pictures of these schools are the landscapes of Heffner. The two largest of these are "On the Banks of Lake Starnberg" and "The Last Glimpse before the Gloaming"—the former embracing a wide view of the flat district about the lake, and especially admirable for the subtle draughtsmanship of the distance as it recedes in successive reaches; the other presenting more striking features in the groups of nearly leafless trees, and the focus of waning light, foiled by rain-clouds. Carl Heffner's forte lies evidently in aerial and linear perspective—in the delicate rendering in vast spaces of cloudland, and their reflected counterpart in water. But should it be felt that his art is more or less restricted in subject as in method, the impression will be removed by inspecting a series of studies from nature, as varied as they are spirited and charming, which will be found on the first floor of the gallery. A picture (9) by Anker of a mother who has brought her sick child to the village quack, is strong and characteristic in passages, if somewhat commonplace, as a whole. "In the Spring Time" (13), by F. A. Kaulbach, has a dainty chic in the figures that might seem rather French than German, but the landscape background is rather too rapid. N. Gysis' picture of a boy wincing under the rude operations of "An Amateur Barber" (73) is vigorous, both in characterisation and execution. O. Seiler's amusing "Ex Fumo dare Lucem" (184)—a painter contemplating his picture as he smokes a pipe, and other works by the same, would be regarded as marvels of minute elaboration had not Meissonnier distanced all competitors on the same miniature scale. Von Bochmann's landscapes with figures—so truthful in aspect, though not altogether satisfactory in colour; Kaufman's studies of character; Braith's cattle-pieces; and examples of G. Max, Munthe, Wahlberg, and others, are also noticeable works of the same schools. The Italian and Hispano-Roman schools are more worthily represented than heretofore in works by Capobianchi, L. Jimenez, Agrassot, Santoro, Andreotti, Michetti, Valles, Rotta, Rioo, and Del Campo. The spirit, brilliancy, and truth of these works are beyond question: they have all the freshness, naiveté, and vigour of virile youth. Foremost among them is Capobianchi's "Tir à la Cible" (3), a scene in a Roman atrium, with children shooting at a target. All the multifarious details of this picture testify to familiarity with classical lore, while the clear and brilliant colouring, the spirited yet precise handling, and the force of light and shade render it one of the very choicest gems of the gallery. "A Musical Jury" (41) with figures in costumes of the end of the eighteenth century, by L. Jimenez, is also an elaborate and beautiful work, but the colouring has a certain stony hardness, lacking atmospheric influences. Of the more familiar Dutch school there are small but good examples of Israels, J. Maris, A. Mauve, Sadée, &c., but on these we need not dwell.

Notices of the Exhibitions at the Society of British Artists and at the galleries of Messrs. Tooth and McLean are unavoidably postponed till next week.

ROYAL INSTITUTION LECTURES.

MECHANISM OF THE EAR.

Professor McKendrick, in his tenth lecture, given on Tuesday, March 21, continued his explanation of the physical properties of sound, and illustrated by numerous experiments the characters of pitch, intensity, and quality. He then, aided by models, described the functions of the various parts of the ear. The external ear acts as a resonator for the higher tones, more especially for those of the human voice. The external auditory canal resonates to the notes E and G in the fourth octave (that is, to tones produced by 2640 to 3168 vibrations per second). The movements of the membrana tympani and of the ossicles of the ear were also described. The tensor tympani tightens the drum-head and makes it more sensitive to high tones, whilst it deadens the effect of powerful low ones. The chain of bones acts like a lever, the length of the arms of which tends to diminish the extent of movement of the base of the stirrup-bone, acting in the internal ear, whilst the force is increased. The function of the chain of bones is to diminish the amplitude of the movement of the drum-head, whilst the force is increased. The movements of the individual bones bear a fixed relation to each other; but move as a whole, so that the internal ear receives from the base of the stirrup a number of little pushes or impulses corresponding to the vibrations of the tone. There are also corresponding vibrations of the membrane covering the round window. By means of the Eustachian tube the pressure of the air on both sides of the drum-head is equalised. The structure of the very intricate cochlea was next described; and also the grounds on which Helmholtz and others formed the theory that it is an apparatus tuned in some way to tones corresponding to the range of the human ear. Where our knowledge of the minute structure of the cochlea is deficient in regard to this theory was referred to, and the Professor suggested that possibly the waves of sound may not cause portions of the cochlea to vibrate, but may produce some direct influence on the nervous tissue itself. In conclusion, it was explained how the cochlea may be supposed to act as an analyser of compound waves. As the ear pays no attention to wave form, so many wave forms may produce the same sensation of tone.

RESEMBLANCES OF LIGHT AND SOUND.

Professor Tyndall, in his second lecture, given on Thursday, March 23, resumed his illustrated explanations of the phenomena of the convergence and divergence of light and sound by means of lenses. After explaining how light is intercepted by an ordinary cloud composed of transparent air and water, he showed how what he termed an acoustic cloud is formed by heated air rising from a gas gridiron and mingling with cold air, and also showed how sound is cut off by such a cloud. This was proved by the sound of a reed which affected a sensitive flame when not intercepted by such a cloud, by means of which also he produced echoes. He next exhibited a fine spectrum of the electric light and a series of tuning-forks; and, after commenting on their analogies, stated that, as there are invisible rays beyond both the violet and red ends of the spectrum, so there are both low and high tones inaudible to ordinary ears. The absorption of light was shown by means of a sodium flame, causing a black line to replace the yellow band in the spectrum. The absorption of sound was demonstrated by two tuning-forks in unison: when a sounding one was silenced, its fellow took up the sound as it were by sympathy. In a brief biographical sketch, the marvellous precocity of Dr. Thomas Young in literature and science was commented on. He was born in 1773, and in May, 1801, he had mastered the principle of interference in all its fruitfulness, and in the same year was appointed professor in the Royal Institution. Dr. Tyndall then read a specimen of Mr. Brougham's acrimonious attack, in the Edinburgh Review, on Dr. Young and the undulatory theory, long opposed, but now universally received. The lecture concluded with beautiful exhibitions of the colours of thin plates, &c.; it was also shown how certain combinations of the waves of light produce darkness, and how certain combinations of waves of sound produce silence.

ELECTRIC RAILWAYS.

Professor Ayrton, F.R.S., gave the discourse at the evening meeting on Friday, March 24. In his introductory remarks, after commenting on the development of our present railway system, through the genius and labours of Stephenson and others, he pointed out some of its effects, more especially the great weight of the locomotive engine, and the consequent waste of steam-power in driving it, and the increased cost of maintenance of the line, bridges, &c. He then referred to the objections to the employment of compressed air, gas, and water, as sources of motive power. The attention of engineers, therefore, was turned to electricity as an available transmitter of energy, safer and more economical than the present system. This object, it was said, is now attained. The potential energy of coal has still to be employed, since one twentieth of it can be converted into electric energy. In 1831 Faraday discovered that a current of electricity can be produced by the rotation of a magnet and a coil of wire; but it was not till 1860 that Pacinotti showed how practically a continuous current can be obtained from a number of intermittent currents. In 1872 Gramme constructed a large working machine. Professor Ayrton fully illustrated his subject by a series of experiments, and also exhibited magnified photographs, specially representing Siemens' electric railway at Berlin. He then described the results of the experimental researches of Professor Perry and himself relating to electric railways, and explained the way in which they had succeeded in removing some of the disadvantages incident to the use of electric energy as a motive power, such as waste of power by leakage; and also explained how the carriages could be illuminated by electricity; and, in conclusion, expressed the hope that eventually by its agency railways would be constructed combining great speed, perfect safety, and economy. At the close of the discourse a circular model of the proposed railway, in four sections, illustrating the block system, was successfully set in action.

MANIFESTATIONS OF VOLCANIC ACTIVITY.

Professor Seeley, in his second lecture, given on Saturday last, March 25, stated that the records of the outburst of the eruption which formed the volcano formally showed that ashes preceded the flow of lava. When the sequence of phenomena was complete an eruption began with trembling of the rocks and noises, which both resulted from a rending of the rocks by the explosive forces beneath; then steam escaped, and with it fine dust. The dust was partly formed by expansion of the steam blowing the rock out into thin films, and partly by trituration of the substances in the volcanic throat, which process was sometimes carried so far that the crater became enlarged into a pit, in which a lake formed. As the steam diminishes, the fragments thrown out become larger, and at last spongy rock issues, which is succeeded by compact rock. The history of the modification of the cone of Vesuvius was traced as evidence of the way in which a cone is reconstructed at the close of an eruption. With the closing of the throat cracks appear, from which issue steam, and springs, and mud. Hot springs mark the last step in the decay of volcanic action, though as they are sometimes eruptive, as in geysers, they may present the phenomena of volcanic eruptions without the outbursts of rock. The occurrence of volcanoes along fissures near to the sea was cited in illustration of the Professor's view that a volcano is a spring in which the waters have become heated by contact with rock, which has been compressed in a region undergoing upheaval. Deep beneath the surface the heated materials held in solution by the waters were deposited in mineral veins, and the same denudation which exposed the mineral veins at the surface often produced a volcanic eruption by reducing the pressure.

MR. GLADSTONE AT HARROW.

Last Saturday the Prime Minister, with Princess Louise and Mrs. and the Misses Gladstone, visited Harrow, in order to witness the trial of Mr. Baillie Hamilton's new musical instrument. After some selections on the instrument had been played, Mr. Gladstone made a few remarks, in the course of which he said:—

For twelve or thirteen years before I filled the office which I now occupy I was a Minister of the Crown under four Prime Ministers, and the whole of those years but one were passed under the auspices of a Harrow man. That portion of my life commenced under Sir Robert Peel; it was continued under Lord Aberdeen, and it was further continued under Lord Palmerston—three of the distinguished names that appear upon the long roll so dear to Harrow. If, my friends, belonging to another great and ancient school in this country, I have no title of sympathy upon that special ground to address you, yet neither is there any disqualification or disability in the fact, because these great schools which belong to us are dear to us all as Englishmen; they are rivals in an honourable competition; but they are also sisters bound together by mutual respect and by warm affection. There is plenty of room for them all. In this life wherein we are set there is no want of work to do; the only want is that of workmen adequate to the task that is before them; and I rejoice to think, as much as I had been one of yourselves, that there never was a period when Harrow was more worthy of the great fame she has attained in former times; or when she exhibited a more admirable organisation, or was more full of the richest promises for the future. Let me deviate for one moment to say that I am glad to see that it is a delight to you to connect your school with the name and with the glorious epoch of Queen Elizabeth. There is a fashion, and I think it is a vicious fashion, of decrying that great Queen. No doubt when the historical student examines her character as a woman he may detect in it this flaw or that flaw; but you, gentlemen, when you apply yourselves to your historical studies, you cannot fail to have your attention drawn by so great and magnificent a figure, and I entreat you, whenever you are tempted to pass a remark upon her human infirmities, never to forget the immeasurable debt which every Englishman owes to the memory and name of Queen Elizabeth.

A novel competition in hairdressing was held last week in Holborn Townhall, under the auspices of the Société du Progrès de la Coiffure. In the first competition the prizes offered were a gold, silver, and bronze medal respectively. The competitors belonged to numerous nationalities, the condition being that they were engaged in London establishments. Nine young ladies acted in the capacity of models. The first prize was awarded by the jury to a young Englishman for a comparatively simple kind of headgear, and a Frenchman came second. The prizes for the next competition were for the two best specimens of coiffures. On this occasion thirteen ladies came forward. The winner of the first prize was a Belgian, who with simple materials contrived a handsome coiffure.

THE DEPARTURE OF JUMBO.

The great African elephant, of the estimated weight of six and a half tons, whose reluctance to quit the Regent's Park Gardens of the Zoological Society of London, for a voyage to his new owners in America, has excited both sympathy and amusement, is now far away on the Atlantic voyage to New York. On Wednesday last week, between nine and twelve o'clock at noon, the keepers managed to get Jumbo securely bound and boxed up in the huge timber cage, nearly as heavy as himself, constructed for his carriage to the trans-Atlantic seaport. In the afternoon of the same day, it was dragged by a powerful team of dray-horses out of the Gardens of the Zoological Society; and on Friday it reached the Docks, travelling by way of Albany-street, Euston-road, King's-cross, Gray's-inn-road, Clerkenwell-road, Old-street, Commercial-street, and Leman-street, to St. Katharine's Docks, near the Tower, a distance of four miles and a half. At St. Katharine's Docks, the box, with the elephant in it, was hoisted by a steam-crane or "derrick" on board a barge, which conveyed it down the river to Millwall. Here, on Thursday afternoon, it was lifted from the barge, in the manner shown by our front-page Engraving, and was placed on a quay or landing-stage of the docks, where it remained till Friday.

On that day, the steam-ship Assyrian Monarch, which had been loading cargo and coaling on the opposite side of the dock, was warped over to the quay where the elephant was to be put on board. The Assyrian Monarch "dressed ship," with the signal code bunting floating the American ensign on the fore and mizen masts, the Union Jack at the stern and the English red ensign at the stern, and the house flag of the Company on the mainmast. A large company of guests had been invited by the owners to witness the embarkation of Jumbo. During the morning a staff of workmen were employed making a temporary deck over the hatchway of the orlop deck for the box to stand upon, and this was caulked and lead-lined by a quarter past two, at which time word was given to get ready. The two keepers, Newman and Scott, placed themselves on the little platform of the cage in front of Jumbo, and the hoisting immediately commenced. The American, "Elephant Bill," stood at the corner, giving directions to the workmen so as to prevent any unnecessary swaying by the men having hold of the guiding-ropes, while Scott leaned down, patting Jumbo's trunk and keeping him from moving more than could be helped. The previous experiences of such aerial locomotion had apparently not been lost on the elephant, and he gave no trouble to anyone. Quickly the box rose to a height sufficient to clear the bulwarks, then was traversed over the hatch, and lowered gently to its resting place, the whole work being completed in exactly eight minutes from the time "Hoist away" was sounded. When it was pronounced "All right" by Newman, who quickly surveyed its position, three ringing cheers were given by those on deck, and responded to from the shore. The derrick was then released, and the ship returned to its old moorings, opposite Messrs. Patton's warehouse, while the carpenters went to work to fix the cage, so that, in the event of bad weather, there could be no possibility of its shifting. Congratulations were loud on all sides as to the expeditious way in which the business had been carried out; indeed nothing could have been more perfect. As soon as Jumbo was in position, a large number of the visitors crowded upon the main deck to look at him. As this was directly opposite his eyes, he became somewhat alarmed, and began to plunge slightly, but a word or two from his keepers and the polite removal of some of his admirers reassured him, and he again resumed his equanimity. In the course of the afternoon he once or twice trumpeted a little, and appeared uneasy, but he would doubtless in a day or two become accustomed to his strange surroundings. As the vessel was busy taking in cargo, with her steam derricks all the while at work, the unusual noises and confinement must have seemed very strange to the poor beast, and the only wonder was that he took everything so well.

The food provided for the elephant upon his passage, which will be about thirteen days, is two tons of hay, three sacks of oats, two of biscuits, and one of onions, a delicacy of which Jumbo is exceedingly fond. After his bestowal on board he was given a good meal, which he seemed thoroughly to enjoy.

Jumbo does not appear to have suffered in any way from his removal, with the exception of a few slight abrasions over the eyes and nose, and close to the ears, which he got when struggling so violently when first confined. He has, however, got a trick of rubbing his trunk backwards and forwards along the bar in front of him; so to prevent him hurting himself in this way it will be covered with rolls of canvas.

The visitors were invited by the owners to a luncheon in the saloon of the vessel, Mr. Patton presiding at one table, and Mr. Vickers at the other. Those present included General Merritt, the United States Consul-General; Mr. Sheriff Ogg, Mr. Under-Sheriff M'Diarmid, Sir Joseph Fayer, Colonel Stuart Wortley, Mr. Edward M'Leon, Chairman of the Joint Committee of the Mansion House Jewish Refugee Fund and the Jewish Board of Guardians; Mr. A. B. Bartlett, Superintendent of the Zoological Gardens; Mr. Clarence Bartlett; Mr. Davis, Messrs. Barnum and Co.'s agent; Major-General Paget; Mr. Rendell, agent to Baroness Burdett-Coutts; Captain Rose, C.S.I.; Captain Wilson; Colonel Birt, the Manager of the Docks; Mr. Tallett, Superintendent of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals; and a number of other ladies and gentlemen. Two or three complimentary toasts were proposed; and advantage was taken of the opportunity to present a gold medal to the American elephant keeper, Mr. Newman, as a token of the respect and esteem he had gained amongst his English friends during his sojourn here. Mr. Bartlett replied for "The Zoological Society of England," in doing so giving a short history of Jumbo. No one, he said, liked the elephant more than he did. He was an extraordinarily good-tempered beast, and while he had many friends he had not an enemy in the world. At the same time he was subject to periodical outbreaks, which from his immense strength made him, although the most amiable, the most dangerous animal that Mr. Bartlett had ever known. The concluding remark of Mr. Bartlett that he would like to see Jumbo again in England some day, and that if not, perhaps he might go to America to look at him, was received with loud cheers. Mr. Sheriff Ogg responded for the City of London, and the health of Jumbo and a safe passage to him were enthusiastically drunk.

Later in the day many of the emigrants, who, to the number of six hundred, have taken passage in the Assyrian Monarch, came on board. Amongst them were about seventy Russian refugee Jews, who arrived in England a week since, and are being sent out by the Joint Committee that sits at the Mansion House. The poor fellows, with their wives and families, brought their few possessions on board with them, and expressed much thankfulness for the kindness they had received. Their quarters are aft, at the other end of the ship from where Jumbo is bestowed, so that neither party can in any way annoy the other. It may be mentioned that the commander of the vessel, Captain Harrison, has on two previous occasions travelled with elephants, as in 1864 he took out a young one, which died on the passage, and in 1866 three others from London to New York for Mr. Barnum. On the last occasion, he was on board the Daniel Webster, a sailing-ship, which was dismasted in a severe gale, and after forty-five days of knocking about got back into Cork harbour, where the vessel was two months refitting. All that time the elephants were on board quite well, and they were delivered safely at the end of the voyage.

The Assyrian Monarch, which is a fine steam-ship, built of steel, belonging to the "Monarch" line of the Royal Exchange Shipping Company, left Millwall Docks at five o'clock on Saturday morning. She was slowly towed down the Thames to Gravesend, which she reached at eight o'clock. Her passage was eagerly watched by multitudes of spectators in boats and ships, and on the banks of the river, who loudly cheered Jumbo at his departure from England. He repeatedly trumpeted, as it were in reply to these friendly acclamations, if it was not from some disturbance of mind at feeling the gentle motion of the vessel. Mr. Tallett, of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, remained on board; and at Gravesend, about one in the afternoon, Lady Burdett-Coutts, the benevolent patroness of that society, came on board with her husband and his brother and other friends. They visited poor captive Jumbo in his box, and gave him a parting feast of buns; after which her Ladyship inspected the accommodation for the human emigrants to America, and kindly spoke with the Jewesses from Russia, the victims of a cruel and stupidly barbarous persecution, who had, like other afflicted people all over the world, heard the fame of her Christian bounty in the land from which they fled. The ship was officially inspected by order of the Board of Trade the same afternoon, and did not leave Gravesend till six o'clock; she went down only so far as the Nore that evening, but attempted to resume her voyage at daybreak on Sunday, in spite of a furious gale of wind blowing from the north-west. This obliged her to remain stationary an hour and a half, a league north of the Gull light-ship; the steamer, however, did not roll so much in the sea as many other vessels would have done. Mr. A. B. Bartlett, and Scott, the elephant keeper, of the London Zoological Society, were most attentive to Jumbo's comfort, and their presence seemed to afford the wise brute a great solace in the trying hour of his rude marine experiences, so soon after leaving the shore. The worthy Superintendent returned to London by landing at one of the Channel ports; and we beg here to offer him our best congratulations and commendations upon the success with which a most difficult service has been most skilfully and carefully performed. The Assyrian Monarch was signalled off the Lizard Point and the Scilly Isles on Monday afternoon, when all was reported to be well on board.

THE SICILIAN VESPERS.

On Friday last (yesterday), in the city of Palermo, the six hundredth anniversary of this famous historical event was commemorated by the beginning of a series of public festivities, which were to continue several days. Garibaldi, whose health is improved, has gone from Naples to be present at this national festival of Sicilian liberation from a foreign yoke. He arrived at Palermo on Tuesday, and was received with adoration. We borrow a short account of the "Sicilian Vespers" from a very useful work, the English translation of which, by Dr. J. D. Morell, LL.D., late H.M. Inspector of Schools, who has also completed the work to the present time, was recently published by Messrs. Longman, Green, and Co. This is the "Compendium of Italian History," by Giovanni Bosco, which is an approved text-book used in the high schools and lycées of Italy, and has already gone through five editions. Dr. Morell has judiciously altered some parts of the work to suit English readers; he has removed the first portion, which relates to the history of ancient Rome, and has made the narrative begin with the year A.D. 476, the date of the extinction of the Roman Western Empire. At the other end of the Italian history, which Bosco terminated with the Peace of Villafranca after the war of France and Italy against Austria in 1859, Dr. Morell supplies an original narrative of the wonderful transactions that have brought about the political unity and independence of that highly gifted nation. He relates the events of Garibaldi's expedition to Sicily and Naples, in 1860, and the overthrow of the Neapolitan Bourbons; the revolutions in Tuscany, Parma, Modena, and Romagna, with the annexation of Central Italy to the kingdom of Victor Emmanuel, and the conquest of Umbria and the Marches down to Ancona; the provisional establishment of the Italian capital at Florence in 1865; the cession of Venice by Austria, in the next year, consequent upon the defeat of Austria by Prussia; and lastly, in 1870, the overthrow of the Pope's temporal sovereignty in Rome, upon the withdrawal of the French garrison, leaving that city to become the metropolis of the whole Italian nation. These most interesting and important events of our own time are narrated by Dr. Morell concisely and summarily, but with a masterly hold of their practical sequence and bearing upon one another; and there is certainly no book that affords such a connected and precise exposition of the entire theme of modern Italian history. Bosco's account, in chapter the twenty-sixth, of the revolt of the Sicilians against the rule of the French Prince Charles of Anjou, who had entered Italy as champion of the Guelph party against the Ghibellines and the Germans, is here subjoined:—

"For seventeen years he (Charles of Anjou) reigned over the Two Sicilies; and during the whole time the people were ill-treated and despoiled by the Royal Commissioners, until the yoke became insupportable. The discontent was universal, and at last broke out into open rebellion, at Palermo, through an accident which I will now relate. Among those who suffered under the oppression of Charles was a certain John of Procida, whose goods had been confiscated by order of the King. He was a learned and noble citizen of Palermo; and, indignant at seeing the people of Sicily oppressed by the tyranny of the French, he excited Peter, King of Arragon, who had married a daughter of Manfred, to come to the conquest of the Sicilian kingdom. Many barons and other nobles awaited only some occasion to initiate the revolt; and the occasion was not long in presenting itself. On March 30, 1282, at the second Easter festival, a French soldier was so insolent as to lay hands upon a girl who was going modestly to her wedding. The bridegroom, coming then into conflict with the Frenchman, was killed. This insult inflamed the minds of the Sicilians; the desire to avenge their countryman spread itself amongst all the relations; and the cry arose, 'Death to the French!' All Palermo rose in arms; the people fell upon the French, and a horrible slaughter ensued. Other cities in Sicily did the same. This slaughter was termed 'The Sicilian Vespers,' because just as the people began to cry to arms, the vespers bells were beginning to ring. At the news of this uprising, Charles came with a numerous army to quiet the tumult; but, Peter of Arragon having just arrived, the Sicilians declared for him; and Charles, after many misfortunes, and chiefly in consequence of the grief he sustained in losing the kingdom of Sicily, is supposed to have voluntarily brought about his own death in 1285. Peter of Arragon was now acknowledged King of Sicily, and by his paternal government repaired, in some measure, the evils caused by his predecessors."

We are indebted to Mr. J. Boyd for the photographs which we have engraved, representing first the Church of Santo Spirito, just outside the gates of the town of Palermo, where the vesper service was going on when the massacre of the French began; and, secondly, the Church of San Giovanni, at which the tocsin was sounded for the general onslaught. A memorial cross, of which Mr. Boyd has made us a sketch, was erected over the graves of those who perished in that terrible affray. The Sicilians, and the Italians of the mainland, are by no means animated with any hostile feeling towards the French; they regard this dire affair of the Vespers at Palermo simply as a protest against foreign domination.

BENEVOLENT OBJECTS.

The anniversary dinner of the Asylum for Fatherless Children at Reedham will be held next Tuesday.

A bazaar of useful and fancy articles was held in Kensington Townhall on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, in aid of the French Protestant Evangelical Church in Bayswater.

The Drapers' Company have placed at the disposal of the London School Board four scholarships, two for boys and two for girls, each of the average value of £30 per annum, and tenable for four years.

Count Münster, the German Ambassador, presided on Thursday week over the seventy-sixth anniversary dinner of the Society of Friends of Foreigners in Distress, which was held at Willis's Rooms; the subscriptions being £2965.

The sixty-ninth anniversary festival of the London Orphan Asylum was held last week at the Albion Tavern, under the presidency of Sir Charles H. Mills, M.P., who was supported by about a hundred city gentlemen. The subscriptions amounted to £3445, including £200 from the chairman.

Lord Derby on Saturday last opened the hospital which has recently been erected at Bury, at a cost of some £13,000. In the afternoon he was entertained at dinner in the Philip's Hall, after which he spoke at some length on the advantages, direct and indirect, which hospitals conferred on the public.

A donation of £25 has been received by the St. John Ambulance Association from the Goldsmiths' Company. Grants for the extension in the City of classes to teach "first aid to the injured" have been made by the Court of Common Council, and several of the City Companies.

Mr. W. H. Smith, M.P., presided last Saturday evening at the anniversary festival of the Artists' Benevolent Fund, which was held at the Freemasons' Tavern. The result of an appeal for assistance was a subscription-list of £800, which included the annual donation of 100 guineas from her Majesty and 55 guineas from the Artists' Annuity Fund.

At a meeting of the board of the Hospital Saturday Fund last Saturday it was stated that the hospitals had refused to allow the fund to be represented on their boards of management. A resolution was passed appointing Mr. Morley, M.P., and others to endeavour to arrive at an understanding with the hospitals and dispensaries on the subject.

The Lord Mayor, accompanied by the Lady Mayoress, paid a visit to the British Home for Incurables, Clapham-rise, last Saturday afternoon, and expressed themselves highly pleased with what they had seen. His Lordship presided at a dinner to celebrate the coming of age of the charity yesterday (Friday). This excellent charity is greatly in need of funds.

It is stated by the committee of the St. Mary's Home for Invalid Ladies at Bournemouth, in their annual report just issued, that they are entirely indebted for the wiping off of an adverse balance in their accounts to the Marchioness of Abergavenny, who, with the assistance of her friends, gave a concert in London, which realised a sum of about £230.

Yesterday week the nineteenth annual meeting of the governors of St. John's Hospital for Diseases of the Skin was held at the Mansion House, under the presidency of the Lord Mayor. The report presented to the meeting stated that the hospital had gradually advanced in usefulness and repute. Last year sixty-four in-patients and 2708 out-patients were attended. Prince Leopold, the Duchess of Cambridge, the Duke of Cambridge, and the Duke of Teck, have lately become patrons of the hospital.

A valuable gold watch and chain and a silver-mounted ink-stand, each with a suitable inscription, have been presented to Sister Gray, of her Majesty's Nursing Service, Royal Victoria Hospital, Netley, in recognition of her skill in nursing and her kindly and devoted attention to the sick and wounded officers during the last campaign in South Africa. The gifts were subscribed for by thirteen combatant officers and the medical officer, who were nursed by Sister Gray at the seat of war.

Two attractive amateur performances will be held at Cheltenham on the Wednesday and Thursday in Easter week for the benefit of the Malvern Home of Rest for Girls and Women, supported by the Girls' Friendly Society in the dioceses of Gloucester, Hereford, and Worcester. The characters will be undertaken by Lady Monckton, Miss F. Chatterton, Sir Charles Young, Bart., C. G. Allan, Esq., and F. C. Bentinck, Esq. Some of the pieces will be the same as those performed by the same talented party before Princess Frederica of Hanover at Hampton Court last August.

On Thursday week the annual meeting of the National Life-Boat Institution was held at the Mansion House, the Lord Mayor in the chair. The report, read by Mr. Lewis, the indefatigable secretary, stated that within the past twelve months eleven new life-boats were placed on the coasts, the total now being 271. During the year its life-boats saved 966 persons from wrecked vessels. The life-boats also helped to rescue 33 ships from destruction. Two gold medals, 33 silver medals and clasps, 46 votes of thanks inscribed on vellum, and £5783 were granted. The expenditure was large, exceeding the increase by £1362.

The Charity Organisation Society proposes to publish within a short period a Charities Register and Digest, which will consist of a classified register of charities in or available for the metropolis, and a digest of information respecting the legal, voluntary, and other means for the prevention and relief of distress and the improvement of the condition of the poor. The scheme of the register is based on an endeavour to give the public generally and the almsgiver a book of reference, which will afford a ready means of ascertaining how, when the circumstances of any case of distress have been learnt and considered, it may, so far as material resources are concerned, be effectually and suitably relieved.

The Albert Medal of the Second Class has been conferred on William Hinton for his gallantry, on Jan. 18 last at Hales-owen, in twice entering into a burning house and carrying out on each occasion a quantity of gunpowder, thereby, in all probability saving many lives.

O THE DOCKS.

OBITUARY.

SIR S. H. DYER, BART.

Sir Swinnerton Halliday Dyer, tenth Baronet, of Tottenham, Middlesex, J.P., died on the 16th ult., at Westcott, Surrey. He was born June 4, 1833, the eldest son of Sir Thomas Swinnerton Dyer, Bart., by Mary Anne, his wife, daughter of Colonel J. A. Clement, R.A., and succeeded his father Oct. 31, 1878. Entering the Army, he served in the Crimea, including the siege of Sebastopol, the assault on the Redan, and other actions. For his services he received the medal with clasp, Turkish war medal, and the Order of the Medjidie, and he retired as Captain 8th Foot. Sir Swinnerton married, July 29, 1858, Helen Maria, eldest daughter of the late Rev. R. Croker, of Athlone, and niece of Mr. T. O'Grady, of The Grange, county Limerick, and leaves two daughters and an only son and successor, now Sir Thomas Swinnerton Dyer, eleventh Baronet, born Oct. 6, 1859.

SIR J. N. DICKINSON.

Sir John Nodes Dickinson, Knt., died at Rome on the 16th ult. He was born in 1806, son of Staff-Surgeon Nodes Dickinson, F.R.C.S., and received his education at Caius College, Cambridge, where he graduated M.A. in 1832. He was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in 1840, and was successively Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of New South Wales from 1844 to 1860, and Chief Justice there from 1860 to 1861. The honour of knighthood was conferred on him in 1860. He married, in 1844, Helen, daughter of Captain Henry F. Jauncey, R.N., of Dartmouth.

SIR EDWARD SINCLAIR, M.D.

Sir Edward Burrows Sinclair, M.D., King's Professor of Midwifery, Trinity College, Dublin, died, on the 24th ult., in Sackville-street, Dublin, aged fifty-seven. He was the eldest son of the Rev. Richard Hartley Sinclair, Vicar of Cashel, by Eliza, his wife, daughter of Colonel Burrows. He graduated at the University of Dublin, and, having served as Assistant-Surgeon in the Army, became assistant-physician in the Rotundo Hospital. Besides being Professor in his old University, he was physician to Sir Patrick Dun's Hospital in Dublin. He received the honour of knighthood in 1880 in recognition of his public services in the training of soldiers' wives as nurses. Sir Edward married, August, 1849, Louisa, daughter of John Munn, M.D., of Dublin, and leaves issue.

DR. KNOX.

The Rev. Thomas Francis Knox, D.D., died at the Oratory, South Kensington, on the 20th ult. He was born Dec. 24, 1822, the eldest son of the Hon. John Henry Knox (brother of the second Earl of Ranfurly), by Lady Mabella Josephine, his wife, daughter of the first Earl of Kilmorey; and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated first class in classics, being also second Chancellor's Medallist. Mr. Knox, a devoted friend of Fathers Faber and Dalgairns, was one of the earliest converts to Catholicity, and succeeded eventually to the office of head of the Oratorians in London.

We have also to record the deaths of—

Dr. Joseph Williams, of Cambridge Park, Twickenham, on the 20th ult., aged sixty-seven. He was author of several medical works.

Commander William Vicary, R.N., who was present as a midshipman on board the Achilles at the battle of Trafalgar, at his residence at Southsea, on the 21st ult., in the ninetyeth year of his age.

Colonel Samuel Burges Lamb, late 4th West India Regiment, on the 17th ult., at Plymouth, in his seventieth year. He served in the 10th Regiment in the Indian campaign 1857-8, and was present at the battle of Agra.

The Rev. Henry Bolton Power, for thirty-five years Incumbent of Bramley, Surrey, on the 18th ult., aged sixty-one. He was youngest son of Lieutenant-General Sir Manley Power, K.C.B., K.T.S., by Anne, his wife, daughter of Colonel Kingsmill Evans, of Lydiard House, county Monmouth.

Colonel Thomas Dyer, Madras Staff Corps, Deputy Adjutant-General, at Madras, in his fifty-second year. He was son of Mr. Thomas Dyer, of Ringwood, Hampshire, served, in 1858, with the Kurnool Movable Column and Sangor Field Division, and received medal and clasp.

Isabella Elizabeth, Lady Grant, widow of General Sir Lewis Grant, K.C.H., Colonel of the 96th Regiment, on the 19th ult., at 80, St. George's-square. Her Ladyship was only daughter of Mr. A. Grant, of Tullochgriban, N.B., was married in March, 1832, and left a widow in 1852.

Mr. William Chambers, J.P. and D.L. for the counties of Carmarthen and Cardigan, who took an active part as a magistrate in suppressing the Rebecca riots in 1843, and was presented with a handsome piece of plate in recognition of his services in bringing about a settlement of the grievances. He was in his seventy-third year.

Mr. William Newmach, F.R.S., J.P., of Brook House, Adlestree, Surrey, at Torquay, aged sixty-two. He was many years manager in Glyn's Bank, and previously actuary of the Globe Insurance Company. He was known as a political economist and statistician, and wrote several useful treatises on different commercial topics.

Lady Louisa Spencer, on the 23rd ult., aged sixty-one. Her Ladyship was daughter of George, sixth Duke of Marlborough, by his first wife, Jane, eldest daughter of George, eighth Earl of Galloway, and was thus sister to the present Duke of Marlborough, K.G. She was married, July 4, 1845, to the Hon. Robert Charles Henry Spencer, and was left a widow June 17, 1881, having had two sons and one daughter.

Major-General Edward Moubray, late Royal Artillery, on the 17th ult., in Kensington Gardens-terrace, Hyde Park, in his fifty-seventh year. He was youngest son of the late Sir Robert Moubray, K.H., of Cockairny, in the county of Fife. He served in the Crimea, at Inkerman, the Tchernaya, and Sebastopol; had the medal, with two clasps, the Legion of Honour, the Sardinian and Turkish medals, and the fifth class of the Medjidie; and was made Major-General in 1872.

Professor Thomas Hill Green, M.A., at Oxford, on the 24th ult., at the age of forty-five. After a brilliant career as an undergraduate at Balliol, where he took his B.A. degree in 1859, and after writing the English Essay (1862), Mr. Green was made Fellow and Tutor of his college, and for many years undertook more especially the philosophic teaching of the Honour students. His great and recognised success in his work led to his appointment as Whyte's Professor of Moral Philosophy, vacant by the resignation of Mr. Wilson, the late President of Corpus Christi College. Mr. Green gave much time and attention to political and social questions, especially as they affected the welfare of the city of Oxford.

Lord John Manners was installed a Master of the Shipwrights' Company on Wednesday, at a dinner given at the Albion Tavern.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All communications relating to this department of the Paper should be addressed to the Editor, and have the word "Chess" written on the envelope.

J.H.R. (Halifax, N.S.).—There are many books dealing with the gambits, and the latest is Mr. Cook's "Synopsis of the Openings."

M.C.B. (Hythe).—You shall have a report on the problem shortly.

H.W.B. (In the position described we should take White for choice.

F.O.N.H. (Liverpool).—You are right, as usual. Have you retired from problem composition altogether?

D.W.K. (Brighton).—Your problem is much too simple. The promotion of a Pawn puzzles very few persons nowadays.

E.J.W.W. (Croydon).—We shall have pleasure in examining the problem.

C.W. (Southport).—Thanks. The problem shall have our best attention.

We have received a copy of Mr. Bland's Chess Club Directory and Chess-players' Manual, and shall notice its contents in an early number.

The match between the Oxford University and the Knight class of the City of London Club was arranged to be played on Tuesday last, the 26th inst., at the Lord Razlan Hotel, St. Martin's-le-Grand. We go to press too early in the week with this part of the paper to chronicle the result, but shall do so next week.

Mr. Thorold played ten adversaries simultaneously at the Bath Chess Club on the 21st ultimo, winning nine games and losing one. The third annual meeting of this club was held on March 11, when a favourable report was submitted to the members.

The North London Club played a match with Kentish Town on the 16th ult., and scored a victory by five to one. The North was not so successful in their next match, played with the Athenium, Camden-road, the latter winning by six games to four and three draws.

A match was played at Burton on the 18th inst. between representative amateurs of Staffordshire and Derbyshire, each county bringing twenty-five selected champions into the lists. Play commenced at two p.m., and was concluded at six o'clock, when the score gave Staffordshire the victory by 264 to 174. Forty-one games were played, the competitors being paired according to their reputed strength.

We regret to be informed that the proposed match between Lancashire and Yorkshire has been broken off. The reason assigned is that Lancashire declines to bring more than fifty players into the field, while Yorkshire insists that there shall be at least a hundred on each side.

A new and revised edition of Mr. Gossip's "Theory of the Chess Openings" is now ready for the press, and as the work can only be brought out by subscription, the author appeals to the public to favour him with its support. The price will be seven shillings and sixpence.

The close of the annual handicap of the City Club is always an interesting event in the chess world, and this year it promises to be more exciting than usual. In the struggle for the chief prizes there are now only four survivors, Messrs. Blackburne and Maczuzki (first class), Mr. Piper (third class), and Mr. B. G. Laws (fourth class). Mr. Blackburne has been paired with Mr. Piper, and their match is looked forward to with the liveliest interest, as the last-named gentleman is likely to tax the champion's powers at the odds of a Knight. Should Mr. Blackburne defeat Mr. Piper he will then play with Mr. Laws for the first and second prizes, and Messrs. Piper and Maczuzki play for the third. In the second division the survivors are Messrs. T. Block, J. Ridpath, M. Down, and A. H. S. Taylor.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated April 2, 1875) of Mr. James Macfarlane, formerly of No. 147, Leadenhall-street, but late of No. 1, Gresham-buildings, E.C., West India merchant, and of No. 35, Gloucester-road, Regent's Park, who died on Dec. 27 last, was proved on the 6th ult. by Mrs. Elizabeth Macfarlane, the widow and sole executrix, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £890,000. Subject to the payment of his just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, the testator gives, devises, and bequeaths all his estate and effects to his wife absolutely.

The will (dated Dec. 13, 1880), with a codicil (dated Aug. 18, 1881), of Mr. John Hartnell, late of No. 17, Blomfield-street, Upper Westbourne-terrace, who died on Feb. 8 last, was proved on the 15th ult. by Frederick James Roberts and Robert Green, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £170,000. The testator bequeaths £200 each to the London Hospital, Whitechapel; the Westminster Hospital, Broad Sanctuary; the Asylum for Idiots, Earlswood; the Infant Orphan Asylum, Wanstead; the Hospital for Sick Children, Great Ormond-street; the British and Foreign Bible Society, the Church Missionary Society, and the Incorporated Church Building Society for England and Wales;—£100 each to Charing-cross Hospital, the Middlesex Hospital; the Royal Free Hospital, Gray's-inn-road; the Royal Ophthalmic Hospital, Blomfield-street, Moorfields; the Samaritan Hospital for Women and Children, Lower Seymour-street, Portman-square; the Royal National Hospital for Consumption and Diseases of the Chest, Ventnor; the Royal Hospital for Incurables, Putney-heath; the London Fever Hospital, Liverpool-road, Islington; the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, Old Kent-road; the National Hospital for the Paralyzed and Epileptic, Queen-square, Bloomsbury; the Refuges for Homeless and Destitute Children, Great Queen-street; the Female Orphan Asylum, Beddington; the Metropolitan Convalescent Hospital, Walton-on-Thames; the Convalescent Hospital, Seaford; the Royal Sea-Bathing Infirmary, Margate; the Royal National Life-Boat Institution, the National Benevolent Institution; and the British Orphan Asylum, Mackenzie-road, Slough;—and numerous other legacies, including £14,000 upon trust for Mrs. Fanny Weston Bernard for life, and at her death to her son, Edward John Bernard, and an additional £7000 to the said Edward John Bernard. The residue of his estate and effects, real and personal, is to be held upon trust for Mrs. Isabella Weston Roberts for life, and then for her issue, as she shall appoint. In default of issue, each of the hospitals, asylums, and charitable institutions before mentioned are to receive a further legacy equal in amount to that directly bequeathed to it.

The will (dated March 9, 1878), with a codicil (dated March 14, 1879), of Mrs. Hannah Sarah Brightwen, late of Great Yarmouth, who died on the 2nd ult., was proved on the 17th ult. in the Norwich district registry by George Brightwen, Robert Harry Inglis Pulgrave, and William Worship, the executors, the valuation of the personal estate being over £50,000. After bequeathing £6000 for the perpetual endowments of St. Andrew's and St. James's churches in Great Yarmouth, £500 to the hospital there, and numerous legacies to friends and dependents, the testatrix makes gifts to the family of her late husband, Thomas Brightwen, banker; to the descendants of her late sisters, Lady Hooker and Lady Palgrave; to her brother, Dr. D. W. Turner; and then gives the residue to her sister, the wife of the Bishop of Chester.

The will (dated June 30, 1881) of Mr. Peter Finch (formerly Peter Finch Steward), of the firm of Steward, Patteson, Finch, and Co., Norwich, brewers and spirit merchants, late of Hurst-grove, Berks, who died on Nov. 13 last, was proved on the 10th ult. by Donald Steward, the brother, and George Lucas, the acting executors, the value of the personal estate being over £38,000. The testator leaves to his executors £100 each; to his wife, Mrs. Elizabeth Finch, £500, and his furniture, plate, pictures, effects, horses and carriages, and for life his residence and an annuity of £500, in addition to the provision secured to her by settlement; and the residue of his real and personal estate to his children, as his wife shall appoint.

The will (dated Feb. 14, 1866) of Lieutenant-Colonel William Blatterman Caldwell, formerly of the 76th Regiment, late of No. 18, St. Stephen's-road, Paddington, who died on Jan. 29 last, was proved on Feb. 28 last by James Townly, M.D., and William Townly Duncan Caldwell, M.D., and Robert Townly Caldwell, the sons, the acting executors, the value of the personal estate being over £18,000. The testator leaves all his estate and effects, real and personal, upon trust for his wife for life, and then for his children.

The will (dated July 13, 1880) of Mr. John Marriott Davenport, F.S.A., late of Oxford, Clerk of the Peace for the county of Oxford, who died on Jan. 31 last, was proved on Feb. 23 last by John Davies Davenport and Thomas Marriott Davenport, the sons, the executors, the value of the personal estate exceeding £16,000. There are some bequests in favour of his sons; and the residue of his real and personal estate the testator gives to his wife, Mrs. Sophia Anne Davenport.

The will (dated Oct. 25, 1881) of General Frederick Johnston, late of The Albany, Piccadilly, who died on Jan. 31 last, was proved on Feb. 21 last by Thomas Frederick Halsey, the grandson and sole executor, the personal estate being over £10,000. The testator leaves legacies to friends in recognition of kindnesses extending over many years, and to servants; and the residue of his property to his said grandson.

The will (dated Jan. 2, 1879) of the Rev. Enoch Mellor M.A., D.D., late of Halifax, who died on Oct. 26 last, was proved on the 4th ult. by Henry Norman Mellor, the son, and John Oakes, the executors, the personal estate exceeding £7000. The testator's wife, Mrs. Isabella Mellor, being already amply provided for, he simply leaves her for life or widowhood the use and enjoyment of his furniture and effects; and the residue of his estate he gives to his children.

The will (dated March 3, 1881) of Mrs. Selina Theresa Mangles, late of Sunningdale, Berks, and of No. 2, Eaton-square, who died on Feb. 7 last, was proved on the 16th ult. by Charles Edward Howard Vincent, the acting executor, the personal estate exceeding £5000. The testatrix bequeaths £200 to St. George's Hospital; legacies to relatives, friends, trustees, and servants; and the residue of her property to her three nephews, Charles Louis Nepean Bishop, Frederick William Freemantle Bishop, and Archibald Herbert Bishop.

Administration was granted on Monday in the Probate Court at Dublin to three nephews—Messrs. Francis Wyse Low, Thomas Wyse Gubbins, and John Gubbins—the next of kin, the late Mr. Wyse, the millionaire of Cork, who died intestate. The personal estate amounts to £2,000,000, and the real estate to £2,000,000 more. The debts amount to £1300.

Replying to a Good Templar remonstrance against the invitation to repeated drinking in his new national song, Mr. Tennyson explains that the "common cup" has in all ages been employed as a symbol of unity, and it is only in reference to that symbol that he has used the word "Drink."

ORPHAN GIRLS who have lost both parents, descended from respectable parentage, are received between the ages of six and seven, from any part of the United Kingdom, into the HOME FOR FEMALE ORPHANS, Grove-road, John Wood-street. They are clothed, boarded, and educated free of all expense, and, on their leaving, at the age of sixteen to seventeen, are, if possible, provided with situations, or are delivered to their friends. The next election will take place in June, and candidates must now be nominated. Those early on the list are usually the successful ones. An annual subscription of one guinea or more constitutes a governor, and confers the privilege of two votes at each election for every guinea subscribed. A donation of two guineas or more constitutes a life governor, and gives one vote at each election for each five guineas. FUNDS will be very thankfully received. Forms of nomination and all particulars may be obtained on application, by letter, to the Hon. Secretary, at the Home.

President—The Right Hon. the Earl of Aberdeen.

Bankers—Messrs. Williams, Denon, and Co.,

Ed. B. RANDALL, Honorary Secretary.

BY ORDER OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LAND COMPANY (LIMITED).

MESSRS. BAKER AND SONS will SELL, by AUCTION, the following FREEHOLD LAND—

SOUTH WIMBORNE—First portion of the BITTERNE PARK ESTATE, with splendid sites for high-class villas and yachting quarters. In deference to the expressed wish of many intending purchasers, the Directors have decided to postpone the first sale until the first of the month of May, when the land will be in hand towards completion. The bridge will be finished during the summer.

SURBITON—SOUTHBOROUGH PARK ESTATE (First Portion).—At the Strawberry Room, Surbiton, on FRIDAY, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 19, 30 Plots of Freehold Building Land, all facing the main road, within half a mile of Surbiton Station, in this delightful suburb, beautifully wooded with firs, which will be included with the plots. Adapted for high-class villas, a first-rate corner plot being reserved for a good hotel or villa.

SOUTH ACTON—BEAUMONT PARK ESTATE.—At the Prince of Wales Hotel, on WEDNESDAY, APRIL 26, 70 plots of Freehold Building Land, including a capital Tavern Plot, adjoining South Acton Station. Unrivalled railway access to all parts from numerous stations surrounding the estate upon all sides, within a few minutes.

WOLSTANTON, STROKE-UPON-TRENT—WATLANDS ESTATE.—At the Magistrate's Room, Burton, on FRIDAY, MAY 12, 70 Plots of Freehold Building Land, in this densely-populated industrial centre, affording sites for residences for those employed in connection with the potteries and other neighbouring industries.

WOOD GREEN, N. BOWES PARK ESTATES (Fourth Portion).—At the Nightingale Hotel, Wood-green, on THURSDAY, JUNE 1, 94 Plots of Freehold Building Land on this popular Estate, one of the highest and healthiest situations round London, almost adjoining Bowes Park Station, Great Northern Railway. Numerous and frequent trains to all parts.

SOUTHEND-ON-SEA—MARINE PARADE (Second Portion).—At the Royal Hotel, Southend, at an early date, the residue of this Freehold Building Estate will be offered, in One Lot or 30 Lots, situated close to the sea and pier, with rural and arid surroundings unusual on the immediate seashore. The recent expansion of the shipping interests in the estuary of the Thames, the proposed extension of the excellent railway service to Shoeburyness, and the shortening of the route to London, have given great impetus to this already highly popular and healthy seaside resort, at present within an hour of London by express-train.

Payment of purchase money of plots on the above estates may be spread over ten years by instalments, 10 per cent deposit being payable at the auction, the balance bearing interest at 5 per cent, and being payable off at any time without notice. Free conveyance; land tax and tithes redeemed by the company. Good water supply and drainage. Liberal depths, good frontages, and kerbed pavements. Particulars and conditions of sale, with plans may be had fourteen days before each sale at the principal agents in the neighbourhood; or of F. A. A. Rowland, Esq., Solicitor, 14, Clements Inn, W.C.; of the Auctioneers, 11, Queen Victoria-street, E.C.; or at the places of sale; and of the Secretary at the offices of the National Liberal Land Company (Limited), 40, Charing-cross, S.W.

(CHLORODYNE).

Dr. J. C. BROWNE, late Army Medical Staff DIS-

COVERED a REMEDY to which he coined the word CHLORODYNE. Dr. Browne is the SOLE

INVENTOR and, as the composition of Chlorodyne cannot possibly be discovered by Analysis (organic substances defying elimination), and since the formula has never been published, it is evident that any sta-ment to the effect that a compound is identical with

Dr. Browne's Chlorodyne must be false.

This Caution is necessary, as many persons deceive purchasers by false representations.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S

CHLORODYNE. Vice-Chancellor Sir W. Page Wood stated in Court that Dr. J. Collis Browne was undoubtedly the inventor of Chlorodyne; that the whole story of the defendant Freeman was delibe-ately untrue, and he regretted to say it had been sworn to.—See the "Times," July 13, 1881.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S

CHLORODYNE is a liquid medicine which assuages pain of every kind, affords a calm and refreshing sleep, without headache, and invigorates the nervous system when exhausted.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S

GREAT SPECIFIC for CHOLERA,

DYSENTERY,

DIARRHŒA.

The General Board of Health, London, reports that it is a charm. On June 23, 1881, Dr. Collis Browne

Dr. Gibbon, Army Medical Staff, Calcutta, states:—

"Two doses completely cured me of diarrhœa."

"From Sykes and Co., Pharmaceutical Chemists,

"Dear Sir,—We embrace this opportunity of congratulating you upon the wide-spread reputation this justly esteemed medicine has earned for it, not only in Hindostan, but all over the East. As a remedy of general utility, we much question whether a better is imported into the country, and we shall be glad to hear

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, APRIL 8, 1882.

Both Houses of Parliament have adjourned for the Easter holidays, and very few people, we venture to think, will miss the debates. It looks as though some malicious sprite presided over, and made sport of, the proceedings of our august Legislature. In reviewing what has taken place since the early days of February, we have rather to take note of curious anomalies and wrong-headed perversity, than to report progress. In the more dignified House we have seen, except on special occasions, a perfunctory meeting four days in the week, at which a few questions are asked, a committee is sometimes appointed, but no measures are presented for discussion, and there is an adjournment at the dinner hour. Although at times there have been debates worthy of the best traditions of our noble Senators, a reform of procedure has been found necessary even in that assembly. Their Lordships are, in future, to meet three quarters of an hour earlier, to give the younger Peers a chance of cultivating their nascent oratorical powers early in the evening. So far, good. Nevertheless, the Times cruelly seized the occasion to taunt the Hereditary Chamber with being more ornamental than useful. That assembly, we are told, is on its trial. But if the House of Lords up to Whitsuntide has no work to do, it is the fault of perverse arrangements which, though perpetuated by tradition, are condemned by common sense.

In "another place" the conditions of Parliamentary life are reversed. Since the opening of the Session the mountain has been in labour, with the proverbial result. Protracted sittings, prolonged debates, and prodigious labour, during two months have resulted in the adoption of a Post Card Reply Bill, the passing of a few essential Supply votes, the acceptance of a resolution protesting against any tampering with the Irish Land Act, and the disposal of one amendment out of nearly a hundred on the first of the Procedure Resolutions. Government nights, partly appropriated by Irish and other independent members for multitudinous questions on matters of trivial importance, and followed by tedious speeches on the uppermost topic, extending to the small hours of the morning, have alternated with counts-out when the sittings have been set apart for private members. Hereditary idleness and representative loquacity have brought matters to the same dead-lock. In both Houses precious time has been wasted, and the Session up to Easter, before a single Government bill has been submitted for discussion, has proved, or seems to be, a complete fiasco.

In this disheartening retrospect there is only one antidote against despair. Though no visible progress can be reported, it is possible that the ground has been cleared for an advance, and order may at length be evolved out of this dire confusion. The final debate—for the present at least—and the great division of last Friday morning may, perhaps, be viewed in that light. At all events, the keen conflict over Mr. Marriott's amendment objecting to the adoption of the closure sustained the oratorical renown of "the mother of Parliaments." It was a battle of giants. Mr. Bright and Colonel Stanley, Mr. M. Henry and Mr. Sexton, Sir Stafford Northcote and Mr. Gladstone, said, with more or less force and fervid eloquence, all that could be advanced in support of their respective views, and the public have ample material out of which a definite conclusion may be extracted. Whether the Ministerial proposal will result in giving the Government of the day an instrument for stifling free discussion, or simply enable the House of Commons to become master of its own time and business arrangements—these were the great alternative issues placed before that Assembly.

Though an air of unreality pervaded the worldly strife, the actual result was a matter of momentous interest, for it involved the possibility of a Ministerial crisis, of a penal dissolution, and of a plunge into political chaos. The great division of Friday morning dissipated all such nervous apprehensions. There has been no such muster of Parliamentary forces since 1869, when the fate of the Irish Church Establishment trembled in the balance. All England and all Europe was scoured for wandering defaulters, and in the end no less than 601 members, out of a possible 637, obeyed the urgent summons of their respective whips. In view of the coalition, for the time being, of Conservatives and Land Leaguers, each of whom put forth their utmost strength, the Ministerial majority of thirty-nine, which was considerably more than had been expected, was undoubtedly a decisive, and may prove to be a permanent, victory.

Past experience would seem to warrant the conclusion that during the remainder of the Session there will be no further party conflict on the same colossal scale. It is true that only a single amendment is by that vote disposed of. But only one or two of the remaining amendments can be regarded in a serious light. The rest may at any time disappear from the Order-Book, or be summarily voted down at a single sitting. It is doubtful whether Sir John Lubbock's proposal of a two-thirds majority will survive Mr. Bright's neat arithmetical analysis, or enlist the favour of the Irish Irreconcilables, who dread the combination of Liberals and Conservatives for the suppression of obstruction as much as they desire the defeat of the Government. Perhaps they will make a fresh rally when the leader of the Opposition proposes to negative the First Rule. But when that stage has been reached—probably not this side of Whitsuntide—the House will be wearied of the whole subject, and it will be extremely difficult to secure an overflowing attendance of members for another great field-day against the principle of the closure, to which the Government have anew declared their intention to adhere.

Apart, however, from the fate of the Procedure Resolutions—most of which are approved by the leader of the Opposition—the perplexities of her Majesty's Ministers are very serious. Three weeks or a month must elapse before the House of Commons will be invited to decide what addition should be made to the words of the First Rule, "when it shall appear to Mr. Speaker." It will be necessary, when the Commons reassemble after a fortnight's recess, to pass some of the Army, Navy, and other Estimates, some of which the Irish members threaten obstinately to oppose. Then will follow, on the 24th, the Financial Statement, which is expected to show a very moderate surplus, and to disappoint the expectation of a substantial remission of taxation, though it may afford one more opportunity for a display of Mr. Gladstone's fertile resources. The need for some considerable modification of the Irish Land Act is now generally admitted, and any measure which the Government may introduce for that purpose will give the Irish malcontents further facilities for obstruction. The most effectual remedy for backward legislation will be a recourse to day sittings, which, if adopted early in May, will enable Ministers to proceed consecutively with the Procedure Resolutions, and must eventually beat down obstruction. Probably when the Whitsuntide holidays appear in sight, the Conservatives will slacken their opposition to the proposed New Rules, which they cannot prevent from passing, and will discover the folly of persevering in a system of tactics that will only lengthen the Session without bringing about tangible results.

The two great aquatic incidents of the week illustrate anew the British passion for manly pastimes on the water as well as on terra firma. The somewhat declining interest in the great University boat-race was justified by the issue of Saturday's contest from Putney to Mortlake, although, as the day was very fine, the race was witnessed by a vast multitude, that lined the bank of the Thames, or crowded the accompanying steamers and boats. As every one knows, the Oxford eight won a hollow victory—ten lengths—owing to the defective strokes, inferior stamina, and unsuitable boat of their rivals. The result was quite expected, and if it did not, perhaps, diminish the number of spectators, it must have tended to discourage active betting, which is certainly no evil. Though we are told by aquatic critics that the winning crew were below the average, their rowing was actually faster (twenty minutes twelve seconds) than in twenty-seven out of twenty-nine matches over the same course. The last three races having been won by Oxford, it is now the turn of Cambridge to redeem its credit. Indeed, the Light Blues have large arrears to make up before they are on a level with their more successful compeers. It seems a curious anomaly that some sixteen athletes should for three months or more be in training for a race that is decided in twenty short minutes! The scene on the Tyne on Monday also testified to the English love of rowing, for, though the weather was far from genial, many thousands of sturdy Northumbrians and others witnessed the sculling-match between Hanlan and Boyd for the championship. It is no discredit to the latter that he was badly beaten by the stalwart Canadian oarsman, whose skill is equal to his strength, and who in the easy management of a boat is probably without a rival in the world.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

Last Saturday was a gala day with all English-speaking people in Rome, among whom I would include not only the British residents in the Eternal City, but likewise the American colony, the Germans, and that steadily-increasing section of native Italian society who study and appreciate the higher productions of English literature in preference to "Lo Scannatojo" ("L'Assommoir"), "Il Ventre de Parigi" ("Le Ventre de Paris"), and other translations into the Lingua Toscana of the edifying romances of M. Emile Zola. On the day in question there was unveiled, in the presence of a large and distinguished auditory, a stone tablet which has been affixed to the façade of the Silvestrelli Palace in the Via della Mercede, and the inscription on which recites that "in the year 1832, the illustrious English novelist, Walter Scott, of Edinburgh, dwelt in this house." The tablet was unveiled by Colonel Ramsay, who, in a brief address, thanked the municipality of Rome, the Roman nobility, and others who had directly or indirectly contributed to the erection of the memorial.

It was certainly "a happy thought" of Dr. J. P. Steele (formerly as well known as he was highly esteemed in medical journalism in London, but who, happily, now is enabled to divide his time between professional practice and lettered ease in Rome), and to whom, I believe, the initiative of the Scott tablet is due, to suggest to Colonel Ramsay the propriety of obtaining from the Municipality permission to affix the stone. Enthusiastic adhesion was given to the project by some of the leading members of the Roman aristocracy, including one who, in his brilliant youth, was the personal friend of Sir Walter; and eventually the Sindaco and Municipal Council insisted that the undertaking should be under the direct auspices of "Roma, Urbs." It is well. The illustrious pilgrim has had his memory duly honoured by an illustrious body.

The Roman noble of whom I spoke as having enjoyed, fifty-two years since, the friendship of the author of "Waverley" is the venerable Duke of Sermoneta, who, for some years past, has suffered under the terrible infliction of blindness; but whose richly-stored memory, carefully disciplined and cultivated in youth, has stood him in good stead now that total eclipse of vision has come. I have heard that the Duke knows the whole, or nearly the whole, of Dante by heart. Well; the late Mr. Mason Jones recited, at St. Martin's Hall, Long-acre, the whole of "Paradise Lost."

I read in Lockhart's "Life" that when, on May 9, 1832, Sir Walter visited the ancient Castle of Bracciano, of which one of the members of the Torlonia family was Duke, there was, among the gentlemen of the party, a certain Don Michel Angelo Gaetani, a son of the Duke of Sermoneta, and who is described by Sir William Gell (Pompeian Gell), who was also of the company, as "a person of the most amiable disposition, gentlemanly manners, and remarkable talents." Sir Walter, to whom Don Michel Angelo had paid every attention during his stay in Rome, conceived a very high opinion of the young patrician, who added to his agreeable qualities a wonderful and accurate knowledge of the history of his own country during the dark and middle ages.

But it was the Duke of Corchiano who told Sir Walter that he was possessed of a vast collection of papers, giving true accounts of all the murders, poisonings, intrigues, and curious adventures of all the great Roman families during many centuries, all which papers were at his service to copy and publish in his own way, as historical romances, only disguising the names, so as not to compromise the credit of the existing descendants of the families in question. "This," remarks Gell, with a slight tendency towards the Bathos, "might have led to some agreeable consequences had Sir Walter's life been spared." I should say so, indeed. Sir Walter would have been able to weave some most "agreeable" romances out of the murders, poisonings, duels, and intrigues of the great Roman families. Shelley was certainly forcible, but scarcely "agreeable" in the Cenci.

In a sensible and impartial article in the Daily News of Tuesday I read, with reference to a recent magazine article from the pen of Mr. Hamilton Aidé, the following:—

We are much inclined to agree with the advocate of a School of Dramatic Art in Mr. Aidé's article, that it is something if a man who is never fitted to be a Hamlet may become a fair Guildenstern or Rosencrantz. After all, it is not in set schools of any art that mannerism, imitation, and monotony are engendered. . . . We have never had a School of Dramatic Art in England; and yet nowhere can there have been more frequent illustrations of the mannerisms and monotony which might be supposed to belong to a formal school.

The somewhat dogmatic assertion that we have never had a School of Dramatic Art in England might be met by the reminder that in the year 1840 it occurred to the admirable (and still living) actress, Miss Frances Kelly, who by her rare talents had acquired a handsome competence, to establish a School for Acting, for which purpose she purchased an extensive freehold property in Dean-street, Soho. I read in Cassell's "Old and New London," Vol. III., p. 194, that Miss Kelly's school was a success, and that a number of pupils hastened to enrol themselves under her banner; but that, "unfortunately," her ambition did not stop here, but encouraged her with the wild idea of building a new theatre on her own extensive premises. Encouraged by the lavish promises of support from her numerous patrons among the aristocracy, Miss Kelly converted the large yard and stabling attached to her house into the Theatre Royal, Dean-street, Soho, by which title, however, it was seldom known, passing generally under the name of "Miss Kelly's Theatre." The toy playhouse is now the Royalty.

But we have had, saving the presence of the writer in the Daily News, a much more ancient School of Dramatic Art than Miss Kelly's modest, and at first successful, adventure in Soho. Hartley Coleridge, in his introduction to the plays of Massinger and Ford, quotes a curious document brought to light in the "New Facts" of the Shakspearean scholar whom Hartley qualifies as "the indefatigable Collier," authorising, under the Great Seal, "Robert Daborne, William Shakspeare, Nath. Field, and Edward Kirkham, from time to time, to provide and bring up a convenient number of children, and them to instruct and exercise in the quality of playing Tragedies, Comedies, &c., by the name of Children of the Revels to the Queene within the Blackfryers in our City of London or elsewhere within our Realme of England." It would seem, adds Hartley Coleridge, that Shakspeare "soon drew out of the concern." He had already ridiculed dramatic 'prentices in "Hamlet." Says Rosencrantz—"There is, Sir, an airy of children, little cyases that cry out on the top of question, and are most tyrannically clapped for't. These are now the fashion, and so berattle the common stages (so they call them) that many wearing rapiers are afraid of goosequills, and dare scarce come thither."

I ask, in perfect good faith, and simply with the desire of acquiring information, a question which has been put to me by a correspondent, and which up to this writing I have been unable to answer. What is the meaning of the very old ejaculation, "Save" or "Heaven save the Mark?" Under the form of "God bless the Mark!" and "God save the Mark!" it occurs several times in Shakspeare—notably in "The Merchant of Venice," in "Othello," and in the First Part of "Henry the Fourth." I have a good many editions of Shakspeare on my shelves; but only two of authority—Howard Staunton and Dyce. Neither takes any note of the expression, "God bless" or "Save the Mark." No allusion is made to "Mark" in the Glossarial Index to Staunton. There is no reference to "Save the Mark!" in Dr. Cobham Brewer's "Reader's Handbook." Nothing in Mr. Eliezer Edwards's "Words, Facts, and Theories," nor in Mr. Wheeler's "Familiar Allusions."

I fared no better when, thinking that "Save the mark!" might have had something to do with shooting at a butt, I went to the archery chapters in Strutt's "Sports and Pastimes" and to Roger Ascham's "Toxophilus." Blackie's "Imperial Dictionary," which is full of technological information, and is, on the whole, much more encyclopædic than the majority of lexicons, is curiously copious of the several significations of "mark," but is altogether silent as to "save the mark." My own conjecture in the matter is wholly unsupported by any but the obscurest internal evidence; still, I give it for what it is worth. May not the ejaculation have had something to do with the practice so common in mediæval times; even in the course of familiar conversation (as it still is in Spain, in Italy, in the South of France, and especially in Russia) of making the sign of the Cross? Launcelot Gobbo, speaking of the Fiend in connection with his master Shylock, would naturally cross himself: might he not as naturally ejaculate "God bless the Mark" as an additional exorcism of the powers of Evil? Observe, too, that the cross scrawled by an illiterate person in lieu of a signature was, and is still, called his "mark." Might not such an illiterate person have customarily uttered a pious exclamation of "Save the Mark" to his act of scrawling, as a kind of "Amen" or "So mote it be?" Finally, in France, when a person sneezes, his next neighbour exclaims, "Dieu vous bénisse!"—why, I am unable to say; yet in olden days the kindly invocation might have been attended with the sign of the cross.

Just as we are going to press, the following arrives from "J. K.," Dublin:—

In this city there are two churches belonging to the order of St. Francis, and the colour of the "habits and cowls" worn by the Rev. Brothers officiating in them is brown, the waist is encircled by a thick white cord, one end of which, hanging on the left side, has five equidistant large knots. The Rev. Fathers belonging to one of these churches, although Franciscan Friars, are Capuchins, and wear beards; possibly the Friar in "Romeo and Juliet" was a Capuchin. The Franciscan Brotherhood were established in Ireland early in the twelfth century, and their history makes no mention of any change in the colour of their "habits," which is uniform all over the world.

While a member of the community in the Church of St. Francis, Merchant's-quay, Dublin, the late Right Rev. Dr. Hughes wore a brown habit; but, when elevated to the Bishopric of Gibraltar, the cape worn by him over the rochet and the robe, or "habit," worn underneath it, was silver grey in colour.

N.B.—While a Bishop, the Right Rev. Dr. Hughes was a Friar of the Order of St. Francis, and such he died. J. K.

Who is to decide when we find the monastic doctors differing so diametrically? I apprehend, however, that Father Bonanni knew what he was writing about in 1706, when Rome must have been swarming with Franciscan friars, and that the four Grey Franciscan Friars, who arrived from Italy in 1214 were not called Grey Friars because they wore brown habits.

I find some curious particulars respecting the Franciscan friars and their habits in Alban Butler's "Lives of the Saints" (Ed. 1838), vol. ii., pp. 579-80. I read that the numerous reformations called of the Recollects or Grey Friars were first set on foot by Fray Juan de Guadalupe in Spain in 1500. Those Franciscans who are Capuchins wear, according to Alban Butler, a patch on the back of their habits (as was recommended by St. Francis in his testament), and their beards not shaved close, but "clipped." Like unto those of modern British convicts? Wadding, Chalippe, and others prove that St. Francis wore a beard, but always exceedingly short, and he made his disciples who had long beards shave them. "The Recollects and Capuchins," says Butler, "wear grey habits; but the Cordeliers and Conventuals, black." The Franciscan nuns, called in Flanders "Sœurs Grises," or Grey Sisters, "formerly wore a grey habit; though they have since changed it in some places for white, in others for black or for a dark blue." Where are your brown Franciscans now? I am not at all tired of poring into the dusty books; but my readers, by this time, must be heartily sick of the entire controversy, and I will desist from further wearying them. Vive la Bagatelle!

The "bagatelle" was to be found in a most lively condition at the Falstaff Club on the evening of Friday the thirty-first ultimo, when the committee held, with complete success, their first "Smoking Concert." There was a very large attendance of members and their friends; and the entertainment provided, thanks to the indefatigable efforts of Colonel Goodenough, who was the entrepreneur of the evening, proved brilliantly attractive. If I might venture to give a word of counsel to the many hundreds of members of the Falstaff Club, some of whom may be readers of this page, it would be to advise them to frequent the club not only on evenings when Smoking Concerts or exceptional "High Jinks" take place, but also on ordinary days and nights. The chief drawbacks to the prosperity of a club which has musical or dramatic or choreographic attributes collateral to its normal ones as a place for social intercourse is that members, when they find that there is nothing in the "entertainment" line going on, are apt to stay away from the club altogether. This is productive of a great deal of harm. Jones looks in at the Club at an uncertain hour. It is possible that he may only find Brown and Tomkins (whom he does not know, personally) in the billiard-room; while Smith, in solitary grandeur, is the sole occupant of the coffee-room. Jones wandering forth, discontented, meets Podgers, and tells him that there is no use in going to the new club, for the reason that there is never anybody there; and Podgers tells Rodgers and Bodgers, who were going to send in their names as candidates. Hearing what Podgers has to say, they abandon their intended candidature. All young Clubs have to go through this disagreeable and often perilous experience.

The preamble of the Paddington Park Bill has been declared non-proven by a Select Committee of the House of Commons; and although, according to the Times, the blow need not be fatal to the scheme, it seriously endangers it, and makes success far from probable. The organ of Printing House Square thinks that the action of the Select Committee will discourage the promoters in their attempt to realise an object of great public utility, and will greatly increase the apathy or hostility of those who care more for saving their own pockets than for carrying out a work that would benefit tens of thousands.

I am not at all sorry that (for the present, at least) the Paddington Park scheme has fallen through. It has been, from the beginning, a hobby, gracefully and airily ridden, and with the kindest intentions in the world; but not less a hobby for that. When the scheme was first mooted, I was pressed by two enthusiastic gentlemen, anxious, on artistic and philanthropic grounds, to carry it through, to support the Paddington Park enterprise in this page and in "another place." I respectfully but resolutely declined to do so, because I hold that, as it is, the Paddingtonians are remarkably well off in the way of green pleasures. They are within a very reasonable distance, indeed, of Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens, of the Regent's Park, Primrose Park and Hill, and Hampstead Heath; and not one of those parks and recreation-grounds is likely at any future time to be disestablished. No; open the area of Lincoln's Inn-fields as quickly as ever you like; but Paddington, I should say, has enough of easily accessible park accommodation.

Who would be an officer in the Militia?—concerning one of whose gallant captains "Atlas," in the World, tells an extremely droll story this week. The Militia are a historic force. They had the honour to be mentioned by Charles the First on the scaffold at Whitehall. The illustrious historian of the "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire" held a command in the Militia. Still—I ask the question advisedly—who would be an officer in the Militia? when, according to an admission made by Mr. Childers in the House of Commons on Monday last, there have been, since the year 1857, no less than fifteen occasions on which Militia regiments have been ordered to alter their uniforms to and from rifle, artillery, Highland, scarlet, and Fusilier dress. Formerly they wore gold lace, and were commanded to change it for silver. Now golden adornments are to be worn again, and the officers are to have an allowance of twenty-five pounds per head to cover the cost of the change. The Government consider the allowance to be a liberal one; but the officers are of a directly contrary opinion; and there is much girding and groaning in Militia mess-rooms.

There is something horrifying in the idea of a militia officer making his appearance on parade or at a Levée in what Mr. Childers called a "mongrel" uniform—say a golden sash and a silver waistbelt, or with silver lace on his cuffs and collar, and a golden badge on his helmet or his shako. But there were halcyon days when "soger officers" dressed very much as they liked. Turning to a work equally erudite and entertaining, the "History of the Dress of the British Soldier" (London: Clowes, 1852), by Lieut.-Colonel John Luard, I light on the following:—

The officers of the Army in the Peninsula ran into great extremes of fashion. But as there was frequently a difficulty in procuring articles of dress exactly according to regulation, considerable latitude was, of necessity, granted. An officer of the Fourth Dragoons, who was very fond of being gaily dressed, was always in search of silver lace; and whenever he went into a town and returned to camp, on being questioned as to what articles of food were to be procured, his answer was, generally, "I don't know; but I found some silver lace."

An officer on Wellington's staff in 1811 wore "his hair very long, and the waist longer, the sash being tied over the hips; the pantaloons very tight at the waist and very large at the lower part of the legs; the buttons on the waistcoat as few and as far apart as possible; and those behind on the coat very wide apart, and very low down"; the skirts of the coat almost as long as those of a modern ulster. The hat was of the true Wellington pattern, cocked, drooping plumes, very long fore and aft, and very low in the crown. Not by any means the hat of the Equestrian Statue on Decimus Burton's arch at Hyde Park Corner. G. A. S.

THE OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE BOAT-RACE.

One has become so accustomed to turn out on a foggy morning before breakfast to see the Oxford and Cambridge boat-race that it was hard to believe that, for once, the tide would serve at a reasonable hour. As a natural consequence of this pleasant return to the course of proceedings usual a few years back, and of the gloriously bright and bracing day, there was quite an old-fashioned exodus to the river-side last Saturday. The road was more extensively patronised than ever; multitudes availed themselves of the South-Western Railway, undeterred by the double fares which the managers of that line, with their customary liberality, did not forget to charge; and, from personal experience, we can answer for it that the Metropolitan and District Railways did not suffer from adopting the opposite plan, and adhering to their ordinary prices, as, after abandoning all attempts to fight our way into three or four trains, we thought ourselves fortunate to form one of nineteen in a compartment intended to carry ten. Once at Putney, however, and on board the Press steamer, all discomforts were forgotten, and we could thoroughly enjoy a very bright and bustling scene. The immense crowd congregated at every favourable spot to witness the start was constantly augmented by fresh arrivals, the river was gay with craft of every description, and the Royal Standard, floating above the umpire's boat, denoted the presence of the Prince of Wales and his suite. At a few minutes before one o'clock the Cambridge crew, wearing their light blue jackets, paddled down to the starting-point, and the Oxonians followed them a few minutes later. We heard little or no betting, as even offers of 6 to 1 failed to tempt the supporters of Cambridge. All being in readiness, Mr. Searle effected a very even start at exactly 1.1 p.m. Though only rowing 37 strokes per minute, against the 38 of their opponents, the Cambridge men at once showed slightly in front, and were leading by a quarter of a length at the Duke's Head, so, for a moment, there appeared a hope that the race would not prove such a hollow affair after all. At the boat-houses, however, the Oxford boat had drawn level, and was nearly clear at Walden's Wharf. This lead was doubled at the Crab Tree, where the Cambridge stroke had dropped to 36, and Higgins was only pulling 34. To our mind the "light blue" coxswain hugged the Middlesex shore too closely at this point, and thereby lost the full force of the tide; but, even thus early, the race was virtually over, for, whilst the form exhibited by the Oxonians was undeniably good, their smart, clean recovery being specially noticeable, the Cambridge boat was rolling a good deal, and hung perceptibly between each stroke. Smith made many well-meant spurts, without, however, producing the least impression on the formidable gap that was now visible between the two boats; indeed, the leaders went further away at every stroke, and shot Hammersmith Bridge in 7 min. 40 sec. from the start, exactly twelve seconds before their opponents passed under it. The rougher water in Corney Reach completely demoralised the Cantabs, who dropped further and further away, and Oxford passed the winning post in 20 min. 12 sec. from the start, having secured one of the hollowest of victories on record. It was officially announced that Cambridge had been beaten by twenty seconds, but double that time was more nearly correct. We append the names of both crews and the latest weights:—

Two illustrations of the boat-race appear on our front page: one showing the Oxford crew pulling ahead of their competitors; the other representing the Press steam-boat on its way down the river with the news of the result.

In the evening the rival crews met at a friendly banquet at the St. James's Restaurant, when the chair was occupied by Mr. E. Vaughan Richards, Q.C.

The Inter-University Sports attracted the largest attendance that has ever been seen at Lillie-bridge on a similar occasion, and it was a pity that the various contests proved somewhat tame, and, as a whole, by no means up to University form. E. Wells (Oxford) won the Mile in fine style in 4 min. 30½ sec., very good time, but, had he been the least pressed, he could undoubtedly have shown a very brilliant performance. No one had much chance against R. H. Macaulay (Cambridge) in the Quarter-Mile, which he won for the third successive year in 50½ sec. When eight events had been decided, each University had scored four, so victory depended on the result of the Three Miles. In this event, W. W. Hough, the Cambridge president, cut down five very moderate opponents with ridiculous ease, and thus Cambridge won the odd event.

THE SCULLING CHAMPIONSHIP OF THE WORLD.

The sculling-match which was decided over the Tyne championship course on Monday last, was perhaps the most important that has ever taken place. The competitors were Edward Hanlan, of Toronto, and Robert Watson Boyd, of Middlesbrough, and the stake at issue was the Championship of the World, held by the former, and £500 a side. It may be remembered that Boyd did not take part in the Hop Bitters Regatta, or in any of the numerous matches that were decided when the Colonial and American scullers were in this country last season, but his latest performances, his victories over Elliot and Hawdon in matches, and over all competitors in the Chinnery Regatta, showed him to be a much-improved man, and the only Englishman who could hope to cope with Hanlan successfully. That wonderful Canadian sculler has never known defeat in a match, and his displays during his training for this event convinced his supporters that he retained his best form. The interest taken in the affair at Newcastle was something wonderful; and we can state as a fact that more people came into the town on Monday last than have ever visited it on a Northumberland Plate day. The scene at the High Level Bridge was one never to be forgotten. Upwards of twenty heavily-laden steamers were lying in the river ready to accompany the race; the bridge itself was crowded with spectators, and every window and door in the adjoining wharves had been taken advantage of by eager spectators. The cutters which carried their pilots were speedily followed by the men themselves, and, after three or four false starts, occasioned chiefly by the anxiety of Boyd to get well away, a capital start was effected. Boyd began at 42 strokes per minute against the 36 of his opponent, and soon held a lead of half a length. He did not, however, retain this advantage for more than a couple of hundred yards, as Hanlan then drew up level with him, and both men had a desperate struggle for supremacy. This was soon decided in favour of the Canadian, and, when once he had placed a couple of lengths between himself and Boyd, he slowed down considerably, and took matters rather easily. At the end of a mile, covered in 5 min. 45 sec. (the fastest time on record on the Tyne), Hanlan was four lengths in front, and then began to amuse himself in his usual way, occasionally stopping rowing altogether for a second or two, waving his hand to the people on shore, &c. For the rest of the distance the race was a mere procession, Hanlan eventually paddling in a winner by four lengths in 21 min. 25 sec.—very good time when it is considered that there was little or no tide for the latter half of the journey. Hanlan is evidently better than ever, and we may give up the hope of seeing him even fairly extended.

PICTURES FOR THE ROYAL ACADEMY AND GROSVENOR GALLERY.

So far as we have seen or heard, less interest than usual has been excited by, or in reference to, the pictures that should appear this year at Burlington House and in Bond-street. Some important works that have been prematurely announced as to form attractions at these exhibitions will not be finished in time. Among these are, we fear, Mr. Alma Tadema's "Meeting of Antony and Cleopatra," Mr. Frith's "Private View of the Royal Academy," large pictures by Mr. Orchardson, Mr. Fildes, and some others. On the other hand, Mr. Holman Hunt's "Flight into Egypt," upon which he has been engaged several years; M. Muncaksky's "Christ before Pilate," which attracted so much attention last year at Paris; and works by Mr. Tissot, including paintings, châssons enamels ornamented with bronze figures, and etchings, are to be exhibited separately. The following are some of the most important pictures that may be expected at the Royal Academy and Grosvenor Gallery. Criticism would be obviously unfair before the works are submitted to the public. We would only premise that R.A. signifies for the Royal Academy, and G. for the Grosvenor Gallery:—

Sir Frederick Leighton—"Phryne," a lifesize full-length figure; "Honey Sweet," two lovers; and half-length female figures. R.A. A profile head of a girl. G.

J. E. Millais—Portraits of H.R.H. Princess Marie of Edinburgh, Mrs. James Stern, Mrs. Budgett, and probably other portraits. R.A. and G.

L. Alma Tadema—Two portraits only. R.A. and G. F. Goodall—"The Site of Memphis," a picture over ten feet long; "Dwellers in Tents," and "Arriving at the Well." R.A.

J. R. Herbert—"Justice is not always slow," another large picture representing treasure seekers violating a tomb unconscious of the approach of two lions. "Esther entering the throne-room of Ahasuerus to intercede for the lives of the Jews," and other works. R.A.

E. Long—"Why do his chariots stay," illustrating the line in Deborah's song, Judges v. 28. R.A.

J. C. Hook—A landscape and three coast scenes. R.A.

J. Pettie—"A Palmer's Tale of the Holy Land," the largest picture the artist has exhibited. "Eugene Aram telling the story of his Crime," and "The Prayer of the Duke of Monmouth to James II." R.A.

G. F. Watts—A lifesize full-length portrait of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales; "The Dove returned no more," and portraits of Motley the historian, Dean Milman, and Sir Benjamin Brodie. G.

E. J. Poynter—Design for the Decoration of the Dome of St. Paul's—to be executed conjointly with Sir F. Leighton. R.A.

H. Herkomer—"Homeward," a large landscape and portraits. R.A. Other Portraits. G.

Sir John Gilbert—"The Fight for the Standard," a large work with numerous figures; "Crabbed Age and Youth cannot live together," and a landscape. R.A. A very large drawing, "The Head of the Procession," will appear at the Royal Society of Painters in Water Colours.

T. Faed—"Going to Tata," "I cannot, Mother—I cannot," and "A Highland Gipsy." R.A.

E. Armitage—"The Meeting of St. Francis of Assisi and St. Dominic among the ruins of Ancient Rome," and minor works. R.A.

G. D. Leslie—"Pique," a young lady disappointed by the non-arrival of her lover; "Molly," from "Wapping Old Stairs," and "Sally in our Alley." R.A.

H. S. Marks—"Lord Saye and Sele brought before Jack Cade and his Rabbblement," the largest easel picture the artist has painted; and single figure subjects. R.A.

P. R. Morris—"The Sirens Three," Scotch fisher-girls; and minor works. R.A. and G.

F. Holl—Several portraits. R.A. and G.

J. C. Horsley—"A Merry Chase."

G. Boughton—Scenes in Holland, and one in Cornwall. R.A. and G.

J. E. Hodgson—Also scenes in Holland. R.A.

B. Riviere—"The Magician's Doorway," two leopards chained at the entrance of an Eastern building; "Una," and other pictures with animals. R.A.

J. MacWhirter—"Ossian's Grave," and others. R.A.

Frank Dicksee—"A Love Story," two lovers. G.

A. C. Gow—"A Jacobite Proclamation." R.A.

W. W. Gullies—Several portraits. R.A.

E. J. Gregory—Portraits. R.A. and G.

J. D. Linton—"The Banquet," one of the series of pictures of which instalments have already been exhibited. R.A.

W. Linnell—"The Luring and Capture of Io," a large picture with numerous figures. R.A.

F. W. W. Topham—"A Messenger of Good Tidings; News of the Relief of Florence in 1496," illustrative of "Romola." R.A.

Mrs. Butler (Elizabeth Thompson)—"Florent Etona," an incident that occurred in the attack on Laing's Neck. R.A.

E. Burne Jones—"The Feast of Peleus," and possibly a more important work, "The Tree of Forgiveness." G.

E. Parton—Landscapes. R.A.

J. Collier—"Clytemnestra," and portraits. R.A. and G.

Other works of mark may be expected from Messrs. Leader, H. Lehmann, E. Barclay, E. Barrett Browning, J. O'Connor, Colin Hunter, Napier Hemy, P. Jacob Hood, H. M. Paget, A. Legros, Cecil Lawson, A. Moore, H. Moore, E. Waterlow, H. Schmalz, R. Macbeth, H. Macallum, F. Morgan, W. B. Richmond, and others.

Mr. Charles Spencer Perceval, LL.D., has been elected a life trustee of Sir John Soane's Museum, to fill the vacancy caused by the retirement of Professor Donaldson.

Lord Kimberley presided last week at a dinner to Sir H. T. Irving, who is about to assume the Governorship of British Guiana. The noble Earl expressed his confidence in the future prosperity of the West Indies.

A VOLUNTEER'S SKETCHES AT THE REVIEW.

Some of the characteristic incidents of the annual Easter Review, and of the journey from London, performed by a few of the Volunteer Corps a day or two before the appointed Monday, are delineated in pages of the Sketch-book of a Volunteer, who last year went down to Brighton with his comrades, to pass inspection on parade, and to take part in the military manoeuvres of the grand field-day. Early breakfast, snatched at a coffee-stall in the hasty walk to the railway station, which is reached just in time, for all but the very "last man," to catch the starting train, begins the day with an unwonted degree of anxious and exciting anticipation. Upon the arrival of the train at its place of destination, the Volunteers are paraded, under the superintendence of the Acting-Adjutant, who is mounted, having sent his horse there to meet him. The gallant steed is "rather fresh," and makes a forcible demonstration to the rear, but, fortunately, without doing serious hurt to friend or foe. After due inspection, the individual members of the corps are free to roam about the town and neighbourhood, and to look after their necessities of board and lodging for the forty-eight hours. They encounter the rude curiosity and ironical admiration of rustic natives with as much self-composure as they are able to command. "Navvies," with pickaxe and shovel, do them the honour of "presenting arms;" while a bevy of servant maidens, from the next farmhouse, bestow their most seducing glances on the Metropolitan Volunteers. In looking for a billet at night, the aid of a lantern is kindly offered to show the path to the public-house, where a bed on the floor, though but of straw covered with a rug, awaits the weary citizen soldier in the hour of needful repose. We now turn to the double-page array of sketches, displaying some incidents of the actual review last year. From roll-call at morning muster, to the end of the sham fight in the afternoon, many details of service in the field are here presented to view. The scouts, the signalling party, the hour of indolent waiting, the brisk alarm, and command to "stand by their arms," the active skirmishing, in stubble which affords but little cover, the attack and repulse, the execution of tactical movements, the anguish of stragglers dropping out of their ranks, and the buglers, it not already "pumped-out," spending their last breath in a desperate "Cease fire" at the end of the fight, are incidents of martial action that will not fail to interest the reader. Whether on the Sussex Downs or those of the Hampshire coast, England expects that every man of her Volunteer force will do his duty on Easter Monday, as well as ever it was done in preceding years.

THE HUNDRED OF HOO RAILWAY.

That part of North Kent which lies between the estuary of the Thames, below Gravesend, from Sea Reach to the Nore, and the estuary of the Medway, below Chatham, to the Isle of Grain and Sheerness, is mainly comprised in the divisional Hundred of Hoo. There are three places named Hoo, all in the hundred, but all their names have an affix—Hoo All Hallows, Hoo St. Mary, and Hoo St. Werburgh. The last mentioned is a village of the time of Edward the Confessor, and is the head of the Hundred. It has a population of about 1500 people, and the soil in the parish is of a rich character, very favourable to the growth of cereals. The Church of St. Werburgh is a very ancient structure, containing several fine brasses and wood carvings. It has a tower and spire, which serve as landmarks, with a peal of six bells. The register of the church dates from 1587.

The Hundred of Hoo Railway, a new line branching off between Gravesend and Higham Stations on the North Kent branch of the South-Eastern Railway, is now completed. Its terminus is at Stoke Creek, nearly opposite Sheerness.

Higham, which is about half-way between Gravesend and Rochester, should also be noticed on this line. Its church has a double nave and chancel, one side having been parochial, the other conventual, for the Nuns of Lillechurch, who were suppressed by Edward IV. on the plea of disorderly conduct. Their property now belongs to St. John's College, Cambridge, who are also patrons of the Vicarage of Higham.

A striking natural feature of this district is the chalk cliff, from which the parish of Cliffe-at-Hoo takes its name, with the rich expanse of marsh stretched below it, on which are to be seen Cliffe Fort, the large cement works of Messrs. Francis and Co., and Cliffe Creek, with East Tilbury church opposite on the Essex coast. One of our illustrations shows the very fine parish church of Cliffe, containing many relics of the olden time. The Archbishop is the patron of the Rectory. The ancient picturesque Rectory House of Cliffe is said to have been one of the manors of the see of Canterbury. This was restored by the late Rev. Henry Robert Lloyd, M.A., who died Rector of the parish in 1880. The new line passes in a cutting about a hundred yards to the south of the village of Cliffe-at-Hoo.

Near this, in a commanding position to overlook the North Kent shore, stands Cooling Castle, which was erected early in the reign of Richard II., by John of Cobham, the third Baron Cobham. It consists of two parallel, but unequal wards, separated by a moat which surrounded both. These wards are four-sided, but not rectangular, and have a round tower at each angle. The dimensions of the outer ward, in which have been erected a modern dwelling-house, offices, and outbuildings, are about 440 by 290 feet, and those of the inner ward 196 by 170 feet, the whole grounds and walls covering about eight acres of ground. Cooling Castle was assaulted and captured by about two thousand men, commanded by Sir Thomas Wyatt, in 1554, in his demonstration to prevent Queen Mary from marrying Philip of Spain. George Brooke, the then Lord Cobham, defended his house with a handful of men from eleven in the forenoon until five in the afternoon, when he was compelled to yield, his ammunition being exhausted, and his gates and drawbridges so battered that his own men began to murmur and shrink. After this time the castle was seldom used as a residence, and was suffered to fall into decay. There is still, however, enough of the ancient building remaining to show its great extent; and no spot in Kent can excel Cooling Castle in historic interest.

The village of Stoke, about eight miles from Rochester, is on the borders of the marsh district. Its church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, was built in the reign of Edward I. The tower is only a little higher than the top of the roof, and appears to have been reduced in height. The church has a chancel, with north aisle, and three massive Norman-Gothic arches on each side.

A full meeting of the Victoria (Philosophical) Institute was held at its house, 7, Adelphi-terrace, on Monday evening, when a paper on "Materialism" was read.

A meeting of Roman Catholic clergy and laity was held in Dublin last week to concert measures for presenting a purse of money to Archbishop McCabe on his elevation to the cardinalate. The subscription reached a total of £2500.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

The House of Lords adjourned on the eve of the Boat-Race till Thursday, the 20th inst. Whether their Lordships spend the Easter vacation in their country seats, in a flying visit to the Continent, or run down to "the Wight" to be handy for the Volunteer Field-Day at Portsmouth, one subject is bound to obtrude itself on their minds. That is the unhappy and lawless condition of Ireland. On the very day noble Lords separated the state of Ireland was the prevailing theme. It may be admitted that only to a skilled strategist like Lord Strathnairn could it have occurred to use Irish disaffection as an argument against the very questionable Channel Tunnel which is being proceeded with without the sanction of Parliament. But the Marquis of Lansdowne's seasonable speech on the unsatisfactory working of the jury system in Ireland, and the conversation which ensued, will not have been thrown away upon the Government. As the Duke of Argyll and the Earl of Dunraven intimated, the public may well grow impatient at the imprisonment of some 600 or 700 men under the Coercion Act when Crime, so far from decreasing, is on the increase. What is the remedy? Men suspected of murders, and probably guilty, are tried, and, as a rule, acquitted by Irish juries. Why not suspend trial by jury, then, for a time in the lawless districts? This course was clearly recommended by a majority of the Committee appointed to inquire into the Irish Jury Laws, Earl Spencer and Lord Carlingford alone objecting. The Lord Privy Seal, answering the Marquis of Lansdowne, pointed out that no other tribunal was suggested by the Committee; but Lord Dunraven indicated that a jury of Judges would best discharge the duty.

When will the Procedure debates end in the House of Commons? Absolutely no progress with the Ministerial proposals has hitherto been made. Yet, not unworthy the palmy days of the Commons was the closing night's discussion of Mr. R. S. Marriott's amendment. The knowledge that Mr. Bright would resume the debate on behalf of the Government caused the House to fill to overflowing. Prince Christian and the Duke of Teck, the Duke of Abercorn, the Duke of Buccleuch, and the Earl of Rosebery were among those observed in the Peers' Gallery. Every seat was occupied. The audience was, indeed, worthy the orator. Mr. Bright was, happily, in good voice. In the silvery tones of old, each word dropping like a polished pebble, did Mr. Bright at once assail the Opposition for their hostility to a reasonable proposition, the necessity for adopting which to suppress the evil of Obstruction must be patent to every impartial member. Now and again ironic cheers came from the Conservatives; but, with an adroitness and readiness of retort peculiarly his own, Mr. Bright on the instant quietly but effectively interjected a reply which unfailingly drew approving cheers and laughter from his own side. Preserving his most scathing sentences for the Irish Home-Rule members, whose thinly-veiled rebellion was a matter for their own consciences, Mr. Bright rose to a lofty pitch of eloquence in his earnest appeal to the majority of hon. members on both sides to say "whether this House of Commons, with its centuries of renown, and its centuries of service, is to be laid prostrate, powerless, and useless at the bidding and at the action of a handful of men who tell you that they despise you, and by their conduct would degrade you." Facing the implacable group of Home Rulers, Mr. Bright trenchantly added, "Do not let them suppose that they are greater friends of Ireland than I am. I taught what were the wrongs of Ireland, and urged that they should be redressed, when some of those gentlemen were in their long clothes. I am not the less a friend of Ireland because I condemn those who, in my opinion, have been of late her worst enemies." The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster showed a serviceable example of terseness of speech. His powerful and much-applauded address was compressed into three quarters of an hour. Colonel Stanley's rising was the signal for departure for dinner. Of the succeeding speeches, Mr. Sexton's was the first to demand notice for the exceptional ability of an attack on the Closure, and upon Mr. Bright, the vituperation of whom by Mr. Parnell's followers shows a singular lack of gratitude on the part of Irishmen to one of Ireland's staunchest friends. Coming to Sir Stafford Northcote, it will be sufficient to state that the right hon. Baronet, while agreeing to most of the new rules in principle, was of opinion that the Closure would deprive the House of some of its liberty. But, reviewing the arguments in a luminous summary, Mr. Gladstone maintained that the Closure rule was framed merely to give the Speaker the necessary means to rescue the House from the "slough of despond" into which it had been plunged by irreconcilable Obstructionists. One of the largest gatherings of members known for some years took part in the important division, which was to decide the fate of the Ministry. By a Government majority of 39 was negatived Mr. Marriott's amendment against closing a debate by the will of a majority—318 against 279 votes. The triumphant cheering of Ministerialists was natural. But they are not by any manner of means yet out of the wood into which the first, the Closure, clause has led them. That some dispatch may be shown when Parliament again is the general desire. Indeed, if dispatch be not forthcoming it is to be feared Parliament will sooner or later have to perform the Japanese rite known as the "happy dispatch."

The only quarter, alas! in which anything approaching dispatch has been evident in the House has been in the passing of the inadequately debated Estimates. Here is an opening for some of the smart young rising members on both sides. Apropos of whom, many will be glad to learn that Lord Randolph Churchill is now better. The "Fourth Party" has need of Lord Randolph, it having become dislocated since the absence of its lively leader, into whose prominent seat at the corner of the bench below the gangway Mr. Chaplin has now and then dropped, it may be mentioned.

Picking out the chief subjects dealt with on the morrow of the great division, one may note that Mr. Forster intimated his willingness to release Mr. Dillon, on the score of ill-health, from Kilmainham if he would promise to go on the Continent; that Mr. Arthur Arnold gained nothing by his motion to quicken the stately action of the Ecclesiastical Commission; and that a count-out ended a relishable discussion on the Scotch Herring Fisheries.

Not without its ludicrous aspect was the little personal episode brought to light by Mr. Callan on Monday. It appeared from the explanations offered that, not threats, but quiet remonstrance was used by the Home Secretary in talking with Mr. Anderson in the Lobby with respect to his objections to the Closure. All the same, the valiant assertion of his power of self-defence by Mr. Anderson, and Mr. Mitchell Henry's ebullition of the ultra-sensitiveness with regard to "eavesdropping," hugely amused the House. Mr. Osborne Morgan having secured the second reading of his little Army Bill, Mr. Jesse Collings brought forward his reasonable proposition for the more equal distribution of the Art and Science grants to provincial cities only to find his motion negatived. Mr. Mundella, with "the three R's" as his motto, rode roughshod over Sir John Lubbock's prayer for a little scientific teaching in Board Schools; and was not able till the small hours to secure a vote of £2,749,863 (an actual increase of £111,500 over last year's Estimates) for Education in England and Wales, and £358,512 for Scotland. Various other questions, among them the condition of Ireland, cropped up on Tuesday; but hon. members generally were anxious to get away for the Easter Holidays, which close on Monday, April 17; the following Monday, the 24th inst., being fixed for the Budget.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

Paris, Tuesday, April 4.

Pâques fleuries, flowery Easter, is the pretty name given by the French to Palm Sunday. With the Parisians, Palm Sunday is one of the most popular days in the Church calendar. In the morning, the churches are invaded by crowds of the faithful, and around the doors are grouped scores of women who sell sprigs of box-wood that is supposed to have been sprinkled with holy water. Along the streets the flower-sellers have laid in a large provision of box, whose varnished green leaves set off the variegated splendour of violets, cowslips, primroses, jacinths, bluebells, and others spring blossoms that make joyous streets. In some exotic shops "palmiers de Jérusalem"—from Algeria—are offered for sale. But the popular emblem of the day is a sprig of box. Everybody you met in the street last Sunday morning had a branch; the cabmen and omnibus-drivers had decorated their horses' heads with veritable bouquets of box; the churches were green with the branches of "goodly trees" and "thick trees," which will be carefully kept until next year, when they will be burnt to provide the ashes wherewith to humiliate the penitent on Ash-Wednesday. Meanwhile, in the vast majority of Parisian households, in the modest garret of the seamstress and in the bedchamber of duchesses, the little sprig of boxwood will be suspended on the wall over the crucifix to preserve the home from misfortune and to defeat the projects of the Evil One.

The Parisian women, who are as practical as they are charming, have long ago put an end to the silly observance of the first of April which has won for it in England the name of April-Fool's Day. Thanks to their ingenuity and to the invention of April fishes—poissons d'Avril—the first day of this month has become a pretext for presents, like Christmas with its soulier de Noël and Easter with its miraculous eggs. A clever French woman, with the aid of New-Year's Day, the fête of her patron saint, her birthday, Christmas, Easter, and the poisson d'Avril, has thus six occasions of obtaining the presents that she desires. She may start with a necklace of pearls on New-Year's Day; on April 1 she will expect earrings; the Easter egg will contain a bracelet; the birthday present will bring a ring; the saint's day a brooch, and there will still remain the diadem for Christmas. Believe me, ladies, you will find it to your advantage to be as learned as the Parisiennes in the art of verifying dates.

In the ceremonies of Pâques fleuries the dead are not forgotten. Last Sunday the cemeteries of Paris were visited by thousands laden with flowers and plants and wreaths, which were placed on the graves of the departed. It was not like the gloomy visit in the chilly fog of All-Saints' Day. It was a pilgrimage of faith and hope, that seemed to partake of the joy and brightness of the spring vegetation bursting into luxuriant foliage under the warm sunlight.

By way of contrast to these simple and charming manifestations of faith, the "Democratic Union of anti-clerical propaganda," consisting of delegates from the free-thinking societies of Paris and the provinces, brought its annual congress to a close on Sunday afternoon by a meeting in the Cirque Fernando. The honorary presidents of this congress were Garibaldi, Victor Hugo, and Louis Blanc. The object of this congress is to obtain the separation of the Church and the State, and the abolition of the Concordat, and at the same time to give a handful of ebullient fanatics an opportunity of airing their intolerant eloquence.

The horse show now open in the Palais de l'Industrie has become the fashionable rendezvous of Parisian, and especially of cosmopolitan, fashion. The show itself is not, perhaps, very remarkable. From an Anglo-Saxon point of view it might appear stupid. Nevertheless, from two to five in the afternoon there is a gay and amusing crowd in the tribunes; a few Dukes and Duchesses who run to horse; heaps of officers, chasseurs in their brilliant blue uniform, dragoons, and artillery officers; a large detachment of the demi-monde; the representatives of the haute gomme, young swells whose ideal is le chic Anglais and a suit of tweed of eccentric tint; and, finally, the exotic colonies in full force, Bolivar Rastacouère labouring to spend the wealth of Brazil and the Indies. The most approved "form" requires the "swell" to endeavour as much as possible to resemble an articulated doll: a hat with a curly and voluted brim, an utterly expressionless face, arms set out stiffly at an angle from the body, a diminutive dust-coloured overcoat coming barely down to the hips, trousers rather short and tight enough to render evident a becoming angularity and bowiness of leg, indicative of habitual horsemanship, a walk like that of an automaton, jerky and with a sort of hesitation in each step, movement of the arms in cadence with the stiff movement of the legs; in short, a masterpiece of irritating stupidity.

The Chamber and the Senate, which, since they met on Jan. 14, have not done much, have decided to do nothing at all, and to take a month's holiday. Both Houses have adjourned until May 2.

There are various reports currents relative to the foundation of several new journals by M. Gambetta, with a view to recovering his lost popularity. M. Gambetta wished to get possession of the Petit Journal and La France; failing that, he intends to found a new journal of his own, with M. Joseph Reinach as editor.

The painter Henri Lehmann died on Friday last, at the age of sixty-eight. He was a pupil of Ingres, and particularly celebrated as a portrait-painter. In 1875 he succeeded Pils as professor at the Ecole des Beaux Arts.

The report of the Royal Institution Lectures is unavoidably deferred.

Mr. J. Orrell Lever, M.P., and Miss Lever entertained on Saturday a large party on board the saloon steamer Victoria to witness the University Boat-Race. Amongst those present were the Duke of Teck, and his sons, Prince Adolphus and Prince Francis, Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, Lord Kinnaird, Lord Suffield, Lord Henry Thynne and the Hon. Mr. Thynne, Lord Crichton, Lord Henry G. Lennox, Lord Claud J. Hamilton, Lord Bingham, Lord Pakenham, Lord Bury and Lady Bury, Sir Richard Cross and Mr. Asheton Cross, the Right Hon. Shaw Lefevre, M.P., and Miss Lefevre, the Hon. P. Bouvier, Mr. H. B. Brand, M.P., and several other members.

MUSIC.

The first concert of the fourth season of the London Musical Society—last week—was interesting from its having included two settings of Schiller's "Nanie"; one by the late Hermann Goetz, the other recently composed by Herr Brahms. Both have been spoken of by us in reference to previous performances, and their repetition again left a decided impression in favour of the work of the deceased composer over that of the living one. A selection from Handel's "Theodora" preceded, and Gounod's "De Profundis" followed the works just referred to. The solo vocalists in Handel's music were Misses Clements and Wakefield, Mr. C. Wade, and the Hon. S. G. Lyttelton. The delivery of the air "Angels ever bright and fair," by Miss Clements, and of "As with rosy steps," and "Lord to Thee," by Miss Wakefield, were the specialties of the solo performances. The choral and orchestral details were very efficiently rendered, and Mr. Barnby conducted ably. The second concert will take place on June 29.

The Sacred Harmonic Society is very near the end of its fiftieth season; and, it is to be feared, of its existence, unless some means be devised of securing the continuance of an institution which has for so many years exercised a great and wide-spread influence of the highest kind in English musical taste. The last concert but one of the present series—last week—consisted of a performance of "Eli," the first of the two great oratorios composed by Sir Michael Costa, whose good influence as conductor of the society since 1848 has been so important an element in the success of the institution. Owing to the continued (but fortunately abating) illness of Sir M. Costa, the performance was again efficiently conducted by M. Sauton. The solos were very effectively sung by Miss M. Davies, Madame Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. Carter, Mr. Sautley, and Mr. Lewis Thomas. The last concert of the series takes place on April 28, when Handel's "Solomon" will be performed. A meeting of the members and subscribers is to be held on April 18, to consider the possibility of reorganising the society.

Mr. John Boosey's London Ballad Concerts closed their sixteenth season very effectively last week with a supplemental afternoon performance, at which a varied and popular selection of vocal pieces was effectively rendered by Misses M. Davies, Sautley, Blandy, Madame Sterling, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Sautley, Mr. Maybrick, and the members of the South London Choral Association; Mr. Carrodus having contributed two brilliant violin fantasias. Two morning concerts are to be given during next month.

The Popular Concerts have just ended their twenty-fourth season. At the afternoon performance of Saturday last Madame Schumann played, with fine effect, Mendelssohn's "Andante" and "Rondo Capriccioso," for pianoforte solo, and another piece in reply to the encore; having also sustained the pianoforte part in Beethoven's great trio in B flat, op. 97. Herr Joachim was again the leading violinist, his associates in the string quartet having been Mr. L. Ries, Herr Straus, and Signor Piatti. At the final evening concert on Monday these gentlemen co-operated in a fine performance of Brahms's string sextet in B flat, the party having been augmented by Mr. Zerbin (second viola) and Signor Pezze (second violoncello). Madame Schumann contributed pianoforte solos with special effect; Herr Joachim and Herr Straus played Bach's concerto for two violins in D minor; Mdlle. Krebs and Signor Piatti were associated in Mendelssohn's variations for pianoforte and violoncello, as were Miss Zimmerman and Herr Joachim in some of this gentleman's adaptations of Brahms's Hungarian Dances; and Mr. Sautley contributed vocal pieces. The names of the artists indicate the excellence of the performances. The concerts will be resumed on Oct. 16.

Professor Sir Herbert Oakeley gave an organ recital last Saturday evening to the members of the Edinburgh Choral Union and their friends in the music-class-room of the University of Edinburgh. There was a crowded and an appreciative audience. The programme was arranged in chronological order, containing specimens of music specially composed for the organ, as well as choral or orchestral pieces arranged for it.

Madame Sainton Dolby's concert last week—chiefly contributed to by pupils of her vocal academy—served to manifest the progress made by the students under her excellent system of instruction. Mrs. Inez Bell, and Misses A. Carter, Cooper, Burgess, Woodhatch, Blackwell, Winthrop, Fursell, Wallis, and Coward, distinguished themselves in various degrees by meritorious performances. The programme included Henry Smart's graceful cantata (for female voices), "The Fishermidwife."

The third of Messrs. Laistner, Mahr, and Leu's trio concerts was given last week at the Marlborough Rooms, Regent-street.

On Monday evening, at the close of the brief rehearsal at the Albert Hall, commencing at eight o'clock, a presentation of a testimonial, consisting of a purse containing £150 and an illuminated address on vellum, was made to Mr. John Hedley, the general superintendent of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society. The testimonial has been raised by the subscriptions of the members of the society on the occasion of Mr. Hedley having arrived at his tenth year of office, and owing to the high favour in which he is held.

The annual concert in aid of the Metropolitan and City Police Orphanage took place at St. James's Hall on Tuesday evening with a varied programme, including the co-operation of eminent vocalists and the band of the A division of police.

Herrn Weber (pianist) and A. Kummer (violinist) gave the second of their interesting concerts of chamber music at the Royal Academy of Music on Wednesday evening.

Sacred concerts were given at the Royal Albert Hall, the Crystal Palace, St. James's Hall, and the Alexandra Palace on Good Friday. In the first-named locality "The Messiah" was performed, with the special feature of Madame Albani's rendering of the soprano solo music.

The date of the first of the new series of Richter Concerts has been changed from May 5 to May 3—a wise alteration, as the performances of Wagner's Nibelungen opera-dramas, at Her Majesty's Theatre, are to begin on the first-named date.

The triennial Hereford Festival will open on Sept. 12, and conclude on the following Friday evening. The first morning performance, in the cathedral, will consist of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," followed, in the evening, by a miscellaneous concert, in the Shire Hall, including the production of a setting, by Alice Mary Smith (Mrs. Meadows White), of Collins's "Ode to the Passions." On Wednesday morning Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," Beethoven's symphony in B flat, Goetz's 137th Psalm, and Bach's "Magnificat" will be given; and in the evening (also in the cathedral) Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" will be performed. On the Thursday a new cantata by Dr. Garrett, entitled "The Shunamite," will be produced; the morning's performances also including Beethoven's Mass in C and Molique's "Abraham." The festival will conclude with "The Messiah," on the Friday morning, and a chamber concert in the Shire Hall in the evening.

Madame Marie Roze has been engaged by Mr. Vert to appear in a series of concerts to be given in the principal cities of England and Ireland. The first concert will take place at Norwich on the 13th inst.

THE COURT.

Her Majesty continues to enjoy her charming retreat on the Mediterranean. Princess Beatrice makes numerous explorations in the district, especially acquainting herself with the various processes employed in the Maynat Artistic Pottery Factory. Prince Leopold is recovering from his accident, and drives out daily; and the health of the Royal family at Mentone is most satisfactory. Lord Lyons, the Hon. W. A. C. Barrington, and Mr. Sheffield, Attachés to the British Embassy in Paris, General Sir H. Ponsonby, and the British Vice-Consul at Palermo, were at a dinner given at the Villa Carlotta by Mr. Hume Dick in honour of the Queen, on the eve of Lord Lyons' return to Paris. Selections of music were given during dinner by the town band. Earl Spencer arrived as Minister in attendance on Lord Lyons' departure, occupying his Lordship's apartments in the Hôtel des Anglais. Divine service was performed on Palm Sunday at the Châlet des Rosiers by the Rev. Canon Sidebotham, the Queen, Princess Beatrice, and their suite being present. The Princess also attended the service at the cathedral, and witnessed the ceremony of the benediction of the Palms. At noon her Majesty and her Royal Highness visited Prince Leopold at the Hôtel Bellevue, and subsequently drove along the Nice road. On Monday her Majesty's gun-boat Cygnat arrived, on board which Princess Beatrice went to Nice, having a delightful cruise, with a calm sea. Her Royal Highness, after passing several hours in the town, returned in the Cygnat to Mentone. The Comte de Paris, who is staying at Cannes, has visited the Queen; and he has inspected the Infirmary, which has returned from Villefranche, and is anchored in the roads opposite the Châlet des Rosiers. Her Majesty and Princess Beatrice have driven to Monaco and other noteworthy localities. The Royal visit to Mentone will be closed on Easter Tuesday, when the Queen proceeds to Cherbourg, whence she embarks on her return home.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

Their Royal Highnesses accompanied the Duke of Cambridge to an inspection of three battalions of Guards in Hyde Park yesterday week. The troops consisted of the third battalion Grenadier Guards, the first battalion Coldstream Guards, and the first battalion Scots Guards; Major-General Higginson commanding. In the evening the Prince and Princess went to the Vaudeville Theatre. On the 1st the Prince, with the Duke of Edinburgh, Prince Christian, Duke Ernest Günther, the Prince of Leiningen, and Prince Ernest of Hohenlohe-Langenberg, was present on board the umpire's boat at the Oxford and Cambridge Boat-Race; and in the evening his Royal Highness dined with Mr. Howard Vincent, Director of Criminal Investigation. The Royal family at Marlborough House went, as usual, to church on Sunday. The Prince was present at some experiments showing Messrs. Clark and Stanfield's ship-raising apparatus at the Westminster Aquarium on Monday. The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, the Grand Duchess and Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, the Prince of Leiningen, and other relatives, have lunched with their Royal Highnesses. The Prince and Princess have been busy in inspecting the principal studios and galleries of Art. Among those recently visited have been Miss Grant's, in Albany-street, Regent's Park, to see the bust and medallion of the late Dean of Westminster; and Messrs. Goupil's gallery in Bedford-street, Covent-garden, to see the pictures of Hubert Herkomer, R.A., and the French Gallery.

The Prince has sent to Sir Philip Cunliffe Owen a bracelet, with "Good luck" in diamonds upon it, with the request that he will give it as a wedding gift to his daughter, who is about to marry her cousin.

The Duke of Edinburgh, upon the completion of his tour of inspection on the south-western coast, dined at the Royal Dorset Yacht Club at Weymouth, after which he returned in the Lively to Portsmouth, and thence to town; the Duchess having already arrived at Clarence House. Their Royal Highnesses went to the Savoy Theatre yesterday week, the Duchess having previously been to the Haymarket and to the St. James's Theatres.

Some further details are published respecting the arrangements for the marriage of Prince Leopold with Princess Helen of Waldeck. There will be eight bridesmaids:—Lady Jane Seymour Conyngham, Lady Mary Campbell, Lady Alexandrina Louisa Maud Vane Tempest, Lady Florence Beatrice Anson, Lady Ermytrude Russell, Lady Eva Sarah Louise Greville, Lady Anne Catherine Sybil Lindsay, and Lady Florence Mary Bootle Wilbraham. The Archbishop of Canterbury will perform the ceremony, and the assistant prelates will be the Bishops of London, Oxford, Worcester, and Winchester. It is expected that the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Connaught will act as the bridegroom's best men. The bride will be given away by her father, and at the conclusion of the service the "Hallelujah Chorus" will be sung by the choir, and guns will be fired in the Long Walk; the "Wedding March" being played on the organ as the Royal personages leave. The line of the procession from Windsor Castle to St. George's Chapel will be kept by a detachment of the Scots Guards, and a travelling escort of the 2nd Life Guards will escort the bride and bridegroom as far as Chertsey on their way to Claremont. It is rumoured that there will be a state banquet and a ball at Windsor Castle in commemoration of the event.

FASHIONABLE MARRIAGES.

Captain Robert Gordon Handcock, of the Bengal Staff Corps, eldest son of the late Hon. Robert Handcock, was married to the Hon. Audrey Mary Florence, eldest daughter of Lord Tenterden, on Thursday week, at St. Marylebone Church. The bridesmaids were the Hon. Geraldine and the Hon. Gwen Abbott, Miss Caroline Pollock, Miss Marion Pollock, Miss Knight, and Miss Handcock. The wedding breakfast was given by Lord and Lady Tenterden at their residence in Portland-place, after which Captain and the Hon. Mrs. Handcock left en route for Paris.

The marriage between Mr. Shelley, brother of Sir John Shelley, of Shobrooke Park, Devon, and Miss Northcote, daughter of the Right Hon. Sir Stafford Northcote, will take place at Pynes, Devon, in the Whitsuntide recess.

A marriage is arranged between Lieutenant-Colonel Hastings, son of the late Hon. Edward Hastings, and Miss Henniker, eldest daughter of Sir Brydges Henniker.

A new die for the next issue of golden coinage from the Mint is completed and is in the possession of the authorities at the Mint. This is only the second die taken during the reign of Queen Victoria, and her Majesty is represented with an Imperial crown, and the likeness is that of the Queen of the present year.

The Botanical Department of the New Natural History Museum, Cromwell-road, South Kensington, which is a branch of the British Museum, will be opened for the first time on Easter Monday. The department will contain some rare specimens of polished wood, together with some valuable cases of ferns and dried specimens of plants.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

ITALY.

The Commission appointed to examine the plans of Victor Emmanuel's monument has declared none of them satisfactory. It has assigned three prizes—one of 50,000*fr.* to M. Nenot, of the French Academy; one of 30,000*fr.* to Signori Piacentini and Ferrari; and one of 20,000*fr.* to Signor Galetti. Five other exhibitors have received honourable mentions.

A stone tablet commemorating Sir Walter Scott's sojourn in Rome in 1832 was unveiled last Saturday by Colonel Ramsay, in the presence of a large and distinguished company. It is affixed to the façade of the Silvestrelli Palace, where Scott lived when in Rome.

The 600th anniversary of the Sicilian Vespers was celebrated yesterday week in Palermo, with much enthusiasm, but without any disturbance. Garibaldi took no part in the proceedings. A regatta, a sham fight, and illuminations in the beautiful bay continued on Saturday; and the festivities concluded on Sunday night with a picturesque procession through the main street of Palermo, transparencies being carried on poles, with devices and inscriptions. The Municipality presented commemorative medals to the official visitors.

SPAIN.

Rioting has occurred in two or three districts of Spain. The cause seems to be dislike of the Franco-Spanish Commercial Treaty and of the new Industrial Tax. A state of siege has been proclaimed in Catalonia. The riots assumed a most serious aspect on Thursday week, but order has been partially restored. Strong measures had to be resorted to in Barcelona, where there was considerable rioting.

PORTUGAL.

The King has prolonged the sittings of the Cortes to the end of April. The Lisbon Geographical Society is urging the Government to retake possession of Manica, on the East Coast of Africa.

GERMANY.

The Emperor has been confined to his room from indisposition, and on Monday he did not receive his usual visits and reports. The Crown Princess has recovered from her affection of the eyes, and was able on Sunday to attend Divine service in the English chapel.

The annual military inspections will begin this year in about a month. May 26 is fixed for the spring parade of the Guards. The autumn manoeuvres of the Fifth Prussian Army Corps will take place before the Emperor on Sept. 6 and 7 in the vicinity of Breslau, in Silesia, at which place the Imperial head-quarters will be established.

The Lower House of the Prussian Diet has adopted the Ecclesiastical Bill, as amended.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

The International Exhibition of Paintings and Sculpture at Vienna was opened last Saturday by the Emperor, who was accompanied by his two brothers and three other Archdukes, and a large retinue of distinguished persons.

Baron Kraus, Acting Governor of Bohemia, has been appointed to the post of Governor of the Province. He at the same time receives the title of privy councillor.

The Austrian Polar Expedition left Pola on Sunday.

RUSSIA.

The Emperor, in an autograph letter, accedes to the request of Baron Nicolai, Minister of Public Instruction, to be relieved of his post; and Secretary of State Delyanoff is his successor.

As General Strelchikoff, public prosecutor of the Kieff military tribunal, was leisurely strolling on the boulevard at Odessa on Thursday week, he was shot in the neck, and died in two minutes. Two men ran away, but were arrested, notwithstanding a violent resistance, in which three persons were wounded. The murderers were hanged on Monday.

The Emperor has commuted the sentences of the Nihilists condemned to death into hard labour in the mines, except in the case of Suchanoff, an officer, whom he allows to have a military execution. Suchanoff, the naval officer who was convicted of having aided in the assassination of the late Emperor, was shot at Cronstadt yesterday week morning.

GREECE.

The Minister of War has resigned, and the War Department is in charge of the Premier pending the appointment of a successor. The Budget estimates the revenue for 1882 as 17,790,500 drachmas more than the revenue of last year, but the large expenditure proposed will leave a deficit of more than 1,000,000 drachmas. A loan of 60,000,000 drachmas is proposed to be expended in improving communications and increasing the navy. The Chamber has adopted the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

AMERICA.

Both Houses of Congress have passed the bill granting Mrs. Garfield an annual pension of 5000*dols.*

An attempt was made on Thursday last week to demolish the monument at Tappan town, New York, erected in memory of Major André, who was hanged there on Oct. 2, 1780, as a British spy. A piece was blown off, and the statue was damaged, but it retains its position, though the base is destroyed.

Amherst College, Massachusetts, has been destroyed by fire. Twenty-three persons, mostly women and children, have lost their lives through the burning of the steamer Golden City at a wharf in Memphis.

A lunatic asylum at Yankton, Dakota, has been burned, and three of the patients perished in the fire.

There was a severe storm near Philadelphia on Sunday afternoon, with a whirlwind, which caused much damage. A water tower at Reading was blown over, crushing some people who had sought refuge there. Three of them were killed.

Cornelius Jeremiah Vanderbilt, brother of William H. Vanderbilt, shot himself through the head on Sunday afternoon, at the Glenham Hotel, New York.

SOUTH AFRICA.

The House of Assembly at Capetown has unanimously voted a resolution authorising the use of the Dutch language in the debates of the House.

According to the reports from Kimberley, all is quiet on the western border of the Transvaal. Some excitement has been caused by the news of gold discoveries near Leydenburg.

AUSTRALIA.

The revenue returns for New South Wales for the quarter ending March 31 were published on the 1st inst., and show a highly satisfactory progress in that colony. The receipts for the quarter amount to £1,670,000, being an increase of £282,000 over the corresponding period of last year. Railway receipts show an increase of £132,000, taxation of £55,000, and rents for sheep-runs of £80,000. Should this rate of increase continue throughout the current year the revenue for the year will exceed £7,000,000, which would be very nearly £1,000,000 in excess of the estimate made by the Secretary of the Treasury in November last. The amount at present on the credit side of the Consolidated Revenue Fund is £3,280,000, of which the sum of £2,600,000 has been advanced to the loan fund for the construction of railways sanctioned by the Legislature.

Lord Hartington has received a telegram from India to the effect that the remission of the India cotton duties came into force on the 10th ult. All cotton leaving after that date would be free of duty.

The golden rose which the Pope blesses on the fourth Sunday in Lent and sends, as a special mark of favour, to one of the Catholic Princesses, is this year destined by Leo XIII. for Princess Stéphanie, wife of Prince Rudolf of Austria.

The National Mohammedan Association of Calcutta has offered a gold medal of 100*rs.*, to be called the "Eden Medal," for the best work in the Urdu language on "The Poet Sa'ada and his Contemporaries," together with a sketch of the Mohammedan female poets of India.

The new route from Bourg to Bellegarde, via Mantua, was opened last Saturday. Besides shortening the journey from Paris to Geneva about thirty miles, the new route offers great attractions in the way of scenery. The highlands between Bourg and the Swiss frontier are among the most picturesque and romantic in Europe.

From a report which has recently been published it appears that in the twelvemonth ended Sept. 30, 1881, assistance was given by the St. Gothard Hospice to 15,730 persons, of whom 3956 had to be lodged for one or more nights, and 123 to be treated as sick persons. The number of meals given to assisted persons was 58,503, and some of the sufferers from Alpine casualties received in the hospice had to be provided wholly or partially with clothing. The expenditure on all those objects was 14,422*fr.*, the receipts only 13,968*fr.* The usefulness, and, indeed, the need of the hospice is so great that it will be maintained at least during the winter months, even after the opening of the tunnel for regular traffic.

BENEVOLENT OBJECTS.

The Duke of Edinburgh, president of the Charing-cross Hospital, will preside at the festival dinner in aid of the funds of that institution, to be held on April 19 at Willis's Rooms.

The Duke of Westminster has given Grosvenor House for a concert in aid of the distressed Irish ladies. Viscountess Folkestone, as well as some well-known professionals, has consented to take part in the entertainment; the date fixed upon being Thursday, May 4.

An admirable selection of vocal and instrumental music, chiefly sacred, was given last week at the Brompton Hospital by Mr. John Stedman and his highly-trained choir of boys, assisted by several gifted friends, whose performances afforded great delight to the numerous inmates.

The fourth annual Italian ball (evening and fancy dress), under the patronage of Baron Heath, Consul-General to the King of Italy, will be held on Wednesday, the 19th inst., in the Freemasons' Hall. It is for the benefit of the French Hospital and the Italian Benefit Society.

The Earl of Aberdeen presided yesterday week at Willis's Rooms at the eighteenth annual dinner of the Home for Little Boys at Farningham. A large company sat down, and the chairman called attention to the good work which was done by the institution. The subscriptions and donations amounted to upwards of £870.

Lord Justice Brett presided yesterday week at the ninth annual meeting of the Barristers' Benevolent Association, held in the hall of the Middle Temple. The funds were reported to have proved insufficient for the demands upon them, and the members of the profession, outside of which no appeal could be made, were urged to greater liberality in subscribing to this useful association.

On Monday afternoon, May 8, by permission of the Earl of Ellesmere, an amateur performance of Mr. Herbert Gardner's comedy, "Time Will Tell," will take place at Bridgewater House, in aid of the funds of the Moore-street Home for Crippled and Orphan Boys, under the immediate patronage of Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne) and Princess Mary Adelaide (Duchess of Teck).

A festival to celebrate the twenty-first anniversary of the British Home for Incurables took place yesterday week at the Albion Tavern, Aldersgate-street, the Lord Mayor presiding. The institution, which is situated at Clapham-rise, is at present affording a home for fifty patients, but if funds permitted the society could accommodate about seventy inmates. Subscriptions to the amount of £1850 were announced.

The Prince of Wales presided last week at the annual festival of the Victoria Hospital for Children held at Willis's Rooms, where a large and distinguished company sat down. In proposing the toast of the evening his Royal Highness advocated the claims of this excellent institution in earnest terms, and urged the great importance of the part it took in the care of the rising generation. Subscriptions were announced amounting to £2500.

The Lord Mayor presided on Monday afternoon at the annual meeting of the Association for the Welfare of the Blind, held on their premises in Berners-street. The report stated that 125 blind persons are employed, of whom two are deaf and one deaf and dumb, and that they had earned in all £5250 during 1881. The report was adopted, and the claims of the association on the public were urged by the Bishop of Bedford, Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth, Viscount Ashley, the Hon. R. Bourke, M.P., Sir Bartle Frere, and others.

Yesterday week the Lord Mayor, who was accompanied by the Lady Mayoress and the Sheriffs, laid the foundation-stone of the new City of London College, near Moorgate-street. The building is intended to accommodate 4000 students, and its cost is to be £15,000, of which £8300 was subscribed before the close of yesterday week's ceremony. An earnest appeal was made to the City guilds, bankers, and merchants for the balance. In the list of subscriptions the following names and amounts appeared:—The Corporation, £525; the Cloth-workers' Company, £500; the Haberdashers' Company, £262; Sir Moses Montefiore, Bart., £100; Mr. E. Clarke, M.P., £105; Mr. S. Morley, M.P., £200; and the Rev. Prebendary Mackenzie, £100. Mr. Edwin A. B. Crockett designed the building, and it is in course of erection under his superintendence.

ART NOTES.

The National Gallery is closed to-day (Saturday) for cleaning. On Easter Monday the Gallery will be reopened.

The trustees of the British Museum have bought for £1000 a large number of drawings by John Doyle, the caricaturist, generally known as "H. B."

An exhibition of oil and water-colour paintings was opened on Monday in the Hackney Club-house, Mare-street—the first of what is intended shall be a series of annual exhibitions in the borough of Hackney.

The South London Free Library and Fine-Art Gallery has obtained on loan for three months an interesting collection of 300 plaques and medallions of old Wedgwood ware, designed by Flaxman, Lady Diana Beauclerk, and others. They are lent by Mr. Felix Joseph, who possesses some of the finest works of Flaxman.

It was determined, at a public meeting recently held at Tavistock, to erect a bronze statue to the memory of Sir Francis Drake. The Portreeve has received a letter from the Duke of Bedford stating that he should feel it an honour to be permitted to present such a statue as a gift to the town which claims to be the birthplace of Drake.

Messrs. J. Barnard and Sons have published, in four books, "The School of Design Drawing Book," a collection of authentic drawings of different periods and styles of ornaments as applied to decorative art, forming a series of instructive studies in freehand drawing, copied from the best models to be found in the art-galleries of the Continent.

Many new pictures in oil and water-colour have been added to the gallery of paintings in the Bethnal-green Museum, some of them being lent by the Duchess of Edinburgh. Fine specimens of Gobelins tapestry have been sent by the French Minister of Public Instruction. The basement of the museum has been entirely rearranged; and the Double-day collection, comprising 30,000 butterflies and moths, will be on view in a room specially set apart for the purpose.

A fine-art exhibition was opened at St. Jude's Schools, Commercial-street, Whitechapel, on Tuesday, by Mr. Leonard Courtney, M.P. The exhibition will remain open daily till April 18, from ten a.m. to ten p.m. (Sundays twelve a.m. to ten p.m.), and admission will at all times be free. The exhibition will include pictures by T. Faed, R.A., E. Long, R.A., H. W. B. Davis, R.A., H. S. Marks, R.A., Professor Richmond, and Josef Israels.

The committee for the erection of a monument on the Thames Embankment in memory of William Tyndale, who first translated the New Testament into English, met last week in the large room of the British and Foreign Bible Society, when it was agreed that Mr. J. E. Boehm, A.R.A., should prepare and place the bronze statue, ten feet in height, on a suitable granite pedestal on the excellent site (west of Charing-cross) granted by the Metropolitan Board of Works. Towards the expense, which will be £2400, the sum of £1200 had been guaranteed by subscribers, and several counties in England had also collected or guaranteed £100 each. The names of these and of other counties, societies or Universities collecting £100 will be inscribed on the pedestal. Tyndale was a student at both Oxford and Cambridge, and meetings are arranged in April for both the Universities, the Vice-Chancellor presiding, at Cambridge. The committee considered that the very strong testimony to the value of Tyndale's translation given in the Preface to the Revised New Testament would commend the proposed statue to counties and towns in Britain, the Colonies, and the United States. The Earl of Shaftesbury is chairman of the committee, and the office is at No. 11, Buckingham-street, Strand.

ANCIENT TABLETS FROM ASSYRIA.

Nine cases, representing a portion of the results of the researches on the point of being resumed by Mr. Hormuzd Rassam, who left this country for Alexandria and Babylon on the 6th ult., have, the Daily News says, arrived in London. The tablets which they contain are for the most part small, and, either whole or in a fragmentary condition, are estimated to reach about five thousand in number. The texts on the tablets are large beyond precedent as compared with the size of the vehicle on which they are inscribed. The new importation, so far as it has been investigated, consists chiefly of trade documents, and largely of contracts for the sale or supply of corn and other agricultural products. They are dated in the reigns of Samassumukin and Kandalanu, the Chindanans of the Greeks, who were contemporary with the latter half of the reign of Assurbanipal, or Sardanapalus, of Assyria, about B.C. 646. The tablets are from Abou-habba, the site of the ancient Sippara, the Sepharvaim of the Old Testament, which is mentioned by Sennacherib in his letter to Hezekiah as one of the cities whose kings had been unable to resist the might of the Assyrians. Sippara—or Pantibiblon, as the Greeks called it—is mentioned by Berosus as having furnished five out of the ten Chaldean kings of the time before the Flood, and as the place where Nisuthrus, or Noah, buried the records of the antediluvian world at the time of the Deluge, and from which his posterity afterwards recovered them. The Hebrew term Sepharvaim, which is the verbal equivalent of the "two Sipparas," is applied to twin cities, one of which is situated on each side of the river. The Sippara from which the tablets just received in London have been procured, is the Sippara of Samas, Tsipar sha Shamas, or Sippara of the Sun god, as being a place, par excellence, where the Sun was a chief object of worship. The other Sippara, or Sippara of Anunit, which is supposed to have contributed in ancient times to name the Sepharvaim of Scripture history, is up to the present moment unknown to modern investigation.

Several thousand persons witnessed the football-match played at Glasgow last Saturday between teams representing Queen's Park and Dumbarton. At the close of the game the former were credited with four goals to one, and thus become the holders of the Scottish Challenge Cup.

Messrs. Longman, Green, and Co., have published "Reminiscences: Ancestral, Anecdotal, and Historic," by Sir Bernard Burke, C.B., Ulster King of Arms. Amusing anecdotes of men and things, and stories of curious family history, combined with information on the peculiar topics which have so long occupied the attention of its author, cannot fail to render this volume acceptable and popular. Most of the contents are of general interest, such as "The Rival Pretensions of Families," "The Memories of the Viceregal Court," "The Rise of Families," "The Perplexities of Precedence," "The Extinction of the Families of Illustrious Men," and especially "Questions often Asked." It appears that for several years the author has been in the habit of keeping a register of various questions put to him on subjects connected with his pursuits, and of the answers he gave to them. These answers contain a fund of information of an heraldic, historic, and anecdotal character. The volume is written in the same pleasant style as "The Vicissitudes of Families."

A large Wesleyan church, erected from the designs of James Weir, F.R.I.B.A., was opened on Thursday week at Fulham by the ex-President of the Conference, assisted by the Revs. M. Osborn, J. Chope, and others. Lady Lycett assisted by receiving purses from young ladies.

Messrs. Sampson Low and Co. have issued their "English Catalogue of Books" for 1881, it comprises a complete list of all the books published in Great Britain and Ireland during the year, and also of the principal books published in America, with their sizes, prices, and publishers' names.

The distribution of prize money for the captures by her Majesty's ship London begins to-day (Saturday), in the Prize Branch of the Department of the Accountant-General of the Navy and Controller of Navy Pay, Admiralty, New-street, Spring-gardens.

The Court of Common Council has affixed the City seal to an agreement with the trustees of the late Earl of Mornington to exchange 50 acres of forest land for the pleasure-grounds of Wanstead House, consisting of 184 acres, and to pay £8000 in cash as a balance of purchase—the pleasure-grounds to be thrown open to the public as a part of Epping Forest.

The Lord Mayor entertained the City friends of the London City Mission on Thursday week at a social gathering in the Mansion House, which was attended by the Earl of Shaftesbury, Mr. Alderman Fowler, M.P., Mr. William Fowler, M.P., Mr. Arthur Pease, M.P., and a large number of other sympathisers with the movement.

Some facts in reference to the cost of electric lighting were stated at a meeting of the Court of Common Council on Thursday week. In one instance the light supplied in the City was about the same price as gas. In another it was twice the price, and in a third rather more than three times. It was added that the improved system of gas-lighting in use in Fleet-street cost four times the price of the Brush system of electric lighting.

The result of the polling in East Cornwall was officially declared last Saturday, when it was announced that Mr. Charles T. Dyke Acland, the Liberal candidate, had polled 3720 votes, and Mr. John Tremayne, who had come forward in the Conservative interest, 3519; thus giving the Liberals a majority of 201. The vacancy was caused by the elevation of Mr. Charles Agur-Robartes to the Peerage on the death of his father, Lord Robartes.

On Monday afternoon the fountain presented to Leeds by Mr. John Barran, M.P., and erected in Roundhay Park, was opened to the public. It is circular in form, and stands about 36 ft. high. Altogether, there are eight drinking places, four on the outside and four on the inside. The total cost has been £2000. The fountain was opened by Mr. Barran, in the presence of several members of the Town Council and a large body of the public.

At the Westminster Police Court, yesterday week, Samuel Newman was again brought up, charged with defrauding clergymen in various parts of the metropolis by obtaining small sums of money to start as a costermonger, his statement being that he had been in prison and wished to lead a reformed life. The prisoner was sentenced to three months' hard labour.—Charles Howard flew at higher game. He was charged at the Central Criminal Court on Saturday with attempting to obtain £100 from the Duke of Sutherland, and other sums from the Duke of Montrose, Lord Leigh, and Earl Spencer by fraud and false pretences, was found guilty, and sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment, without hard labour.

The Judges of the Queen's Bench gave judgment on Thursday week for the plaintiff Clarke in the action against Mr. Bradlaugh, M.P., and ordered that the amount of the penalty, five hundred pounds, should be paid into court within a fortnight—the question of costs to await the result of the appeal to the House of Lords.

The annual conversation of the Cymmrodorion Society, which has been lately revived in London, was held yesterday week at the Freemasons' Tavern, and was well attended by the members and their friends. It was originally founded about a century and a half ago, for the encouragement of literature, science, and art in Wales. Sir Watkin Wynne, M.P., is its president, and there are about 300 members, some of whom sent interesting works of art for exhibition. A programme of music, not entirely Welsh, was gone through at intervals.

The Southern Conference of General Baptist Churches held its spring meetings on Monday in the new Baptist Chapel, Bethnal-green-road, E. The retiring president, the Rev. W. Harvey Smith, presided, and there was a fair attendance of ministers and delegates. The secretary, the Rev. W. J. Avery, read the report for the last half year, which showed that seventeen out of twenty-one churches in the Conference had sent in returns, and that the net result was an increase of eighty members in five months. The midsummer meeting of Conference was appointed to be held on July 5. At the public meeting in the evening, the President-elect, Mr. E. Cayford, gave his inaugural address on "How should the Church deal with the young on week-days;" and a discussion ensued.

Lord Shaftesbury presided on Monday night at a largely attended farewell meeting in Kensington Townhall, in connection with the departure of a party of missionaries about to sail for the Congo, West Africa, under the auspices of the Livingstone Inland Mission, an organisation established four years ago for evangelising by industrial mission stations and self-supporting missionaries the Upper Congo Valley, Central Africa. It has already, it was mentioned, a chain of stations extending 220 miles up the course of the river, and twelve missionaries in the country. Sir Arthur Cotton, the Rev. Donald Fraser, and the Rev. Dr. Underhill, secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society, were amongst the speakers. Fourteen missionaries, including some American and Swiss, all about to start for Africa, were on the platform, and startling accounts of the progress of the missions were given.

Sir William Armstrong presided at Willis's Rooms last Saturday evening over the annual dinner of the Institution of Civil Engineers, and was supported by a numerous and distinguished gathering. The Duke of Edinburgh acknowledged one of the loyal toasts, the Duke of Cambridge responded for the Army, the Earl of Northbrook returned thanks on behalf of her Majesty's Ministers, the Duke of Buckingham replied for the House of Lords, and Sir M. E. Hicks-Beach, M.P., for the Commons. Mr. Charles Hutton Gregory proposed the Colonies, coupled with the name of Sir Henry Parkes, the Premier of New South Wales, who, in expressing his gratification at the manner in which the toast had been received, dwelt upon the resources of Australia as presenting a vast and as yet untapped field for the labours, the enterprise, and the triumphs of engineering genius.

The distribution of prizes at the Oxford Military College, which, as its name indicates, prepares chiefly for the Army, took place on Thursday week—the Marquis of Hertford presiding. The reports from the governor, head master, and examiner of the college, Professor Arber, and Monsieur Buc, Taylorian Professor, testified to the efficient work done at the college, and the steady progress made. The Marquis of Hertford addressed the students at some length. He complimented them on their military bearing and discipline, the high tone prevailing amongst them, and expressed himself thoroughly satisfied with all he had seen and heard of the college. The Bishop of Oxford followed. He said, I have been acquainted for several years with the institution, and agree in all that the noble Lord has said respecting its usefulness. Professor Ackland expressed himself to the same effect, and alluded in favourable terms to physical training and the necessity of paying proper attention to health.

Miss Mary P. O'Connor, sister of Mr. T. P. O'Connor, M.P. for Galway, and president of the Athlone Ladies' Land League, was, in default of sureties for good behaviour, committed last Saturday at Athlone Petty Sessions to Mullingar Jail, for convening a meeting of tenants at Drum, in the county of Roscommon, and advising them to pay no rent.—On an accusation of having incited the people, at a Land League hunt at Shanaglish, in the county of Galway, to murder a farmer in that district, the Rev. Father O'Higgins, a suspended priest, has been committed for trial at the Galway Assizes. Mr. A. E. Herbert, a magistrate, and landlord of property in Castleisland, county Kerry, was on Thursday night, last week, shot dead near his own residence, and within a quarter of a mile of the police barracks.—Mr. W. B. Smythe, an extensive landowner in Westmeath, was shot at whilst driving home from church on Sunday. He escaped, but his sister-in-law, Mrs. Henry Smythe, who was in the carriage with him, was killed, nearly the whole left side of her head being blown away.

An interesting incident in the life of Longfellow was related by Mr. Moncure D. Conway, at his chapel in South-place, Finsbury, on Sunday. Mr. Conway was told by the poet in 1853 that many years before, when he visited London, he, being then without any personal friends in the metropolis, experienced that sense of solitude which a stranger in London is apt especially to feel upon a London Sunday. He happened to walk into South-place Chapel, where Mr. W. J. Fox was then pastor. As he entered, the congregation were singing the poet's "Psalm of Life." The cheering effect upon Longfellow—the "thrill of joy" which he felt—was ever with him a cherished reminiscence of that visit to London. He had never before heard his poem sung. After being told this story on Sunday, the congregation were asked to sing the "Psalm of Life," and this was done with fervour. All the music at South-place on Sunday was sung to the words of Longfellow, and "Longfellow" was the subject of Mr. Conway's discourse.

"Who shall watch our watchmen?" is the question suggested by the following police case:—The Richmond magistrates were engaged for a considerable time yesterday week in hearing a charge of burglary preferred against a constable of the Metropolitan police, named William Guthrie. Mr. Marshall, a chemist, of Kew, had missed sums of money from his till, and on Monday, last week, he secreted himself in the parlour adjoining his shop, in company with three friends. Shortly after midnight, the prisoner presented himself through a trap-door leading into the shop, and at once made his way to the till, which he unlocked. Mr. Marshall and his friends then rushed upon him, when he extinguished his bull's-eye. One of the prosecutor's friends, however, threw the light of a dark lantern upon him, and, presenting a revolver at his head, said, "318 V, if you move a step, you are a dead man!" Prisoner was taken into custody, and at the Richmond police station were found upon him a corkscrew, a small table-knife, and a combination tool, with the gimlet open. The magistrates committed him for trial.

THE QUEEN IN THE RIVIERA.

The amenities of her Majesty's sojourn on the Mediterranean shore, in these weeks of repose and wholesome change of scene, are much enhanced by the local attractions, to a visitor at Mentone, which the taste of English residents has pointed out, and even improved. We have given some views of the Châlet des Rosiers, Mr. C. Henfrey's villa, which was offered by its owner and graciously accepted by the Queen, for her temporary abode. It is situated near the beach, but on ground high above the sea level, amidst a wood of olives and orange and lemon trees. It faces the sea, with Mentone on the right and the mountain which marks the frontier between France and Italy on the left. It is approached by a zigzag path called the St. Jacques, about 120 yards in length, starting from the sea. This route leads to the gardens of the châlet, which are designed after the English fashion, adorned with palm-trees, orange-trees and rare exotic plants, the most beautiful to be found in Mentone. The châlet is constructed after the manner of the Swiss villas, with a terrace encircling the ground floor. The entrance is to the right of the châlet. There is a porch reached by marble steps. Thence one enters the vestibule, to the right of which is the Queen's dining-room, and to the left a small salon, the study of her Majesty. The two bay windows of the dining-room open on the terrace in the direction of Italy. The study contains a small elegant table in black wood fringed with gold, which is the work-table of the Queen, and also a large table, six chairs, and a sofa. The bedrooms of the Queen and of Princess Beatrice are on the first floor. A boudoir separates them. The furniture of the Queen's bed-room is in oak and bamboo. There is a magnificent bed, in the style of Louis XIV., and richly gilded, from Baden-Baden. It is the property of the Queen. The room of Princess Beatrice is furnished in like manner. On the second floor are five chambers, which will be occupied by the suite of the Queen. They are furnished in the same style, though less richly than the Queen's bed-room. On this floor, and looking to the front, has been constructed a sort of loggia, whence a splendid view may be obtained. As the châlet is not large enough for all the suite, two houses near at hand—namely, the Villa Henrietta and the Villa San José, belonging to M. d'Adhemar—have been put at their disposition. The Hôtel des Anglais has also received General Sir H. Ponsonby and some of the suite.

Among the delightful scenes of the neighbourhood, visited by the Queen and Princess Beatrice, not the least interesting is the romantic garden which Dr. J. Henry Bennet, M.D., has constructed upon the rocky terraces of the mountain side, 300 ft. above the sea, at Grimaldi, a hamlet with an old ruined feudal tower, east of the bay of Mentone. His horticultural plans and achievements are described in his book, "Winter and Spring on the Shores of the Mediterranean," in which the botanist, and naturalists generally, will find much that is worthy of their notice. Dr. Bennet at once made an offer to her Majesty, which was graciously accepted, of the exclusive use of this garden during her stay at Mentone. It is perfectly isolated in the mountains, but within ten minutes' drive of the Châlet des Rosiers, and has an extent of about eight acres, hanging as it were on the flank of the mountain. The Queen and Princess must find this a real boon of enjoyment, as the garden of the villa which they inhabit is too much overlooked. There are two pleasant rooms in the ancient tower, commanding magnificent sea and mountain views; and this garden, which is on the Italian side of the frontier, near the Pont St. Louis, may be esteemed one of the loveliest spots on the face of the earth.

Another of our illustrations shows the Palazzo Orenco, at La Mortola, near Mentone, which was visited by the Queen and Princess Beatrice on the 25th ult. It is the residence of Mr. Thomas Hanbury, whose well-known garden and grounds, of about one hundred acres, occupy almost the entire cape bounding the bay of Mentone on the east. The Royal party remained about two hours; her Majesty sketching the lovely view of the coast from the drawing-room windows and greatly admiring the rare plants collected from all parts of the world, with which the garden abounds. It is known that La Mortola was a station in the time of the Romans; and the mother of Julius Agricola lived at Ventimiglia, the neighbouring town, in the first century. A piece of the old road, which has existed for the past two thousand years, runs through the garden; and near this are tombs, containing Roman lamps, coins, and relics of antiquity. The house is four or five hundred years old, and was anciently used for defensive purposes, when the coast was ravaged by Saracens and Corsairs. Mr. Hanbury, who was formerly a well-known merchant at Shanghai, has been knighted by the King of Italy for his efforts to promote education in this part of the Riviera.

LOSS OF THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM-SHIP DOURO.

A terrible disaster at sea, causing much loss of life, took place off Cape Finisterre, Bay of Biscay, on Saturday night, about eleven o'clock. The Royal Mail Steam-Ship Company's ship Douro, on her homeward passage from Brazil to Southampton, had left Lisbon on the Friday of last week, and had passed forty-five miles north of Cape Finisterre, when she came into collision with a Spanish steamer, the Yrurac Bat, of Bilbao, which was on a voyage from Corunna to Porto Rico or Havannah. Both vessels sank within half an hour; but a hundred and twenty persons were saved from the Douro, and thirty-six from the Spanish steamer, being picked up from boats by the British steamer Hidalgo, of Hull, which fortunately happened to be near. The Douro had on board fifty-five passengers for Southampton—namely, thirty-eight from Lisbon, nine from Rio de Janeiro, two from Bahia, and six from Pernambuco. The crew numbered eighty hands. The Yrurac Bat was bound from Corunna to Havannah, and is believed to have had sixty-eight persons on board, including passengers. Many of the Douro's boats were smashed by the collision, but the others appear to have been lowered, and the passengers placed in them. A scene of great confusion is stated to have followed the collision, and it seems certain that the only survivors from either vessel are those who were picked up by the Hidalgo. This would make the loss of life on board the Douro fifteen, and on board the Yrurac Bat thirty-two, or a total of forty-seven. It is stated, however, in a telegram from Vigo, that four of the passengers and eighteen of the crew of the Douro are missing, including the captain, four officers, the purser, and the first and second engineers, so that it seems doubtful how many persons have really perished. Several of the survivors received injuries by the collision. The mails, specie, and baggage on board the Douro are lost.

The accounts of this disaster by no means agree as to where the fault lay, but from the statements made as to the damage received by each vessel, it would appear that the Yrurac Bat must have struck the Douro almost amidships on the starboard side, as the latter vessel had a large hole in that place, and the Spaniard had her bows stove in.

A telegram from Corunna received at Lloyd's states:—"The Douro, when 45 miles north of Finisterre, wind N.N.E., strong, sighted a light on starboard bow; the chief officer was on the bridge; sea heavy; order given to port, too late to save collision; the vessel was struck at 10.50 p.m.; officers cool, but no authority maintained after collision; confusion in lowering boats; tackle of boat fouled, no knives to cut away; at eleven sinking fast, stern first; seven boats had got away safely; the Hidalgo stood by and rendered every assistance."

The Mayor of Southampton has arranged a conference with the local representatives of the Royal Mail Steam-Ship Company for the purpose of opening a fund for the relief of sufferers by the loss of the Douro.

EASTER IN RUSSIA.

A page of sketches has been engraved, showing the manner in which Russians keep their Easter Festival. During the forty days' fast they abstain from all food derived from the flesh of beasts or from lacteal products, milk, butter, and cheese being strictly forbidden, and eggs likewise. Fish, vegetables, and pastry may be eaten, but these must be cooked with oil. On the morning of Easter Sunday every person greets every other person with the exclamation, "Christus Voskris!" that is to say, "Christ has arisen!" Old and young, of the Russian Church, rush into one another's arms and bestow on each other a brotherly kiss; women and girls, people of different ranks and classes in society, accept this Easter greeting from strangers. It is droll to see how "moujiks" and "zvorniks," coachmen and house-porters of St. Petersburg, who have perhaps already taken so much brandy as to lose their sense of propriety, will claim to give a fraternal embrace to any fashionable lady or gentleman they meet. The gendarmes or military police are fondly hugged and kissed, upon this occasion, by the affectionate "roughs" of the city; and there is much treating with something to eat or something to drink. Among people of refinement, the kissing is on the forehead or the cheek; every Russian lady will kiss the brow of her visitor on Easter Day. On the steps of the great Isaac Cathedral, there is a brisk traffic in branches and sprigs of blossoming willow, this plant, as in England, being taken to represent palms at the Church festival of Palm Sunday. The branches are blessed by a priest, and are then hung up in the people's dwellings, behind the pictures of saints on the walls; they are believed to secure good health and good fortune to the household during the next twelvemonth. Another sketch represents the priest blessing articles of food, pies and tarts, cakes, hams, and groceries, which the people bring to him for this purpose; he sprinkles these articles with holy water, and pronounces a benediction, as he passes along a lane formed of benches and boards upon stands, outside the church-door. Behind the priest, as we see, walks an attendant or acolyte, carrying two baskets, one of which contains a store of the consecrated wax-tapers, for sale to those who will present them as offerings in the church, while the money gained by their sale is put into the other basket. The grand ceremony of benediction, at midnight, performed by the Archimandrite at the Isaac Cathedral, attracts a congregation of thousands, waiting several hours in the cold. When the prelate, with an imposing procession, comes forth out of the opened doors, they fall upon their knees to receive his blessing. Most of them, exclaiming "Christus Voskris!" make the sign of the cross, at arm's length over their breasts, and fall to mutual embracing and kissing, whether friends or enemies. It is customary, if any criminals in Russia lie under sentence of death before Easter, not to let the execution be postponed beyond that day, lest the Czar should feel himself obliged to grant a pardon without regard to the justice of the case. Immediately after the Easter ceremonies, there is a general resort to feasting and indulgence in the pleasures of the table. Medical opinion condemns this practice, more especially when the stomach has been weakened by forty days' fasting. The physicians, apothecaries, undertakers, and grave-diggers, if they thought only of their own pocket, might have nothing to say against it.

City Chambers, March 17, 1882.

ORPHAN GIRLS who have lost both parents, descended from respectable parentage, are received between the ages of six and eleven, from any part of the United Kingdom, into the HOME FOR FEMALE ORPHANS, Grove-road, St. John's-wood. They are clothed, boarded, and educated free of all expense, and, on their leaving, at the age of sixteen to seventeen, are, if possible, provided with situations, or are delivered to their friends. The next election will take place in July, and candidates may now be nominated. Those early on the list are usually the successful ones. An annual subscription of one guinea or more constitutes a governor, and confers the privilege of two votes at each election for every guinea subscribed. A donation of five guineas or more constitutes a life governor, and gives one vote at each election for each five guineas. FUNDS will be very thankfully received. Forms of nomination and all particulars may be obtained on application, by letter, to the Hon. Secretary, at the Home.
President—The Right Hon. the Earl of Aberdeen.

THROW PHYSIC TO THE DOGS.
A correspondent writes to ask me which I consider the best medicine for a confirmed dyspeptic subject? "Indulge in." My dear Sir, or Madam (I don't know which it is, for only initials have been used as a signature), I am not a doctor, neither do I profess to know anything at all about the British Pharmacopoeia. When advised to take this or that nostrum for any little ailment, I always quote Shakespeare, "Throw physic to the dogs; I'll none of it." And I would say the same to my present interlocutor. ENO'S FRUIT SALT is the only thing in the way of medicine I indulge in; and though it may sound something like a puff, yet I find that it is all I require to keep me in health, provided I also remember St. Paul's advice to be temperate in all things.—Pictorial World, Feb. 25, 1882, "Notes on Men and Things."
CAUTION.—Legal rights are protected in every civilized country. Examine each bottle, and see the capsule is marked "Eno's Fruit Salt." Without it, you have been imposed on by worthless imitations. Sold by all Chemists, Price 2s. 9d. and 4s. 6d. Directions in sixteen languages how to prevent disease. Protection in every country. Prepared only at Eno's Fruit Salt Works, Hatfield, London, S.E., by J. C. Eno's Patent.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
SOSTENENTE PIANOS,
for Extreme Climates.

With the Perfect Check-Register Action, Patented 1862, 1868, 1871, 1875, 1879, and 1881, throughout Europe and America.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.

"Paris, Nov. 4, 1878.
"I have attentively examined the beautiful pianos of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons that are exhibited at the Paris International Exhibition of 1878. I consider them to be exceptional in the tone with which gradations of sound can be produced, from the softest to the most powerful tones. These excellent pianos merit the approbation of all artists, as the tone is full as well as sustained, and the touch is of perfect evenness throughout its entire range, answering to very requirement of the pianist."
"Ch. Gounod."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.

"Paris, Sept. 8, 1878.
"We, the undersigned, certify that, after having seen and most conscientiously examined the English Pianos at the Universal Exhibition of 1878, we find that the piano belongs to the Grand Piano of the house of Brinsmead.
"NICOLAS RUBINSTEIN,
"D. BLAGININ,
"Chevalier ANTOINE DE KONTERI, Court Pianist to the Emperor of Germany."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.

"I have pleasure in expressing my opinion that the Paris Exhibition Model Grand Pianoforte of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons are unsurpassed. The tone is deliciously sweet, sustained, and extraordinarily powerful; the touch responsive to the faintest and to the most trying strains on it, and the workmanship is simply perfect."
"W. Kuntz."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.

"Illustrated London News."
"The principle of the Brinsmead firm is to give the best piano of its kind and the best of materials, the best of care, the best of taste, and the best of finish, and this is why the manufacture in Kentish Town sends down to Wigmore-street so many pianos perfect in scale, sustained in tone, elastic in bulk, with equal and responsive touch, and, in fact, as near as possible to that ideal that all musician must require—'A thing of beauty that is a joy for ever.'"
"W. Kuntz."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.

"Daily Chronicle."
"In tone the instrument is exceedingly rich and sweet, and in touch the very perfection of lightness. Messrs. Brinsmead may certainly be congratulated upon their success."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.

"Morning Advertiser."
"The Legion of Honour. In addition to the other distinctions awarded to Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons at the Paris Exhibition of 1878, the founder of the firm has been created Chevalier of the Legion of Honour."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.

"Daily News."
"A new Pianoforte, recently manufactured by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, claims nothing new, but on account of its beauty and richness of tone, but especially for some ingenious mechanical novelties, the most important being the addition of a third pedal, by means of which the sound of any note or notes may be almost indefinitely prolonged at the will of the player. Thus bass notes may be sustained after being struck by the left hand, which may then be taken away, and, with the right hand, may execute the most brilliant staccato passages, thus giving almost the effect of four hands. The patent 'check-repeater' action, a specialty of Messrs. Brinsmead, enables the performer to command with ease the most rapid repetition of the same note; the facility of the key movement in general being such that glissando passages can be executed with such perfect ease as to render them practicable with the lightest touch. The volume of tone is intensified by a peculiar construction of the sounding-board, another improvement being the system of bridging, by which the vibrations are increased and rendered sympathetic. The Pianoforte is capable of all degrees of delicacy and power, its massive structure rendering it less liable to get out of tune than usual; and the instrument is altogether calculated to extend the reputation of its makers."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
PIANOS

may be obtained of all the principal Musicians.

SKETCHES OF PORTSMOUTH.

In another page of this week's paper we describe the arrangements for next Monday's review. Our present purpose is rather to describe some of the features of interest in Portsmouth and the neighbourhood which might otherwise escape the notice of those who have not previously visited the locality, or who possess no special local knowledge. Portsmouth, while one of the most ancient boroughs in the kingdom, is also one which has undergone remarkable expansion in the course of the present generation. It has more than doubled its population in the time; and this means, amongst other things, that one half of the town is, comparatively speaking, new. It is equally true, though not necessarily implied, that many of its ancient landmarks have been removed. When the review of 1868 took place the old fortifications still encircled the place; and, if cumbersome and useless, they were at least picturesque. To-day scarcely any vestiges of these old-time memorials remain, and such as still survive are doomed to early extinction. One of these "bits" is the Town Quay Gate, of which our Artist presents us with a recognisable illustration. It will shortly be removed to permit of the extension of the Camber and the erection of a new Custom-House, and if the change be to something less ornamental it will, at any rate, be more useful. The Town Quay, however, is not one of the first objects to strike the eye; and it will, perhaps, be better for us to make the acquaintance of the old town in a more orthodox manner.

As we are coming from London, and have not joined the citizen soldiers in their famous march to relieve the garrison, we prosaically take the train at Waterloo or London Bridge, and after rather more than a two-hours' ride, at a not particularly rapid rate, are safely landed at the Town Station, as it is now called, in contradistinction to the Harbour Station, at the end of the Hard, which immediately faces the Isle of Wight. This extra three-quarters of a mile is, no doubt, a great convenience to travellers from London and from places along the railway who wish to reach "the Island" with as little trouble as possible; but the extension has had one very objectionable effect. It runs through Victoria Park, dividing it into two very unequal portions, and depriving it of any pretensions to an imposing appearance. In 1868 the extension had not commenced, and the park was merely a geographical expression. For some years the ground was suffered to remain as meadow land, and it is only four years since it was formally opened by the then Mayor, Alderman W. D. King. The flower-beds are neatly laid out, and considerable success has attended their cultivation; but there is a deficiency of shrubs, with no trees to speak of at present. The situation, however, is central, if not exactly commanding, and it was naturally one of the first objects to attract our artist's attention. It is noticeable that the high-level platform at the station crosses Commercial-road, the busiest thoroughfare in the borough; and from this platform a very good view can be obtained by those who are fortunate enough to have access to it of the Volunteers as they march along the road on the way to Portsdown Hill. Immediately below is the park, where the guns are to be parked, and no doubt, when gay with decorations, as it will be next Monday, a striking effect will be produced. But we are visitors rather than Volunteers, and, turning our back to the hills, we at once make for the old town of Portsmouth. Outside the station Commercial-road makes a considerable curve, and taking the branch which conducts us in a westerly direction, we pass the Theatre Royal—rumour says it is to be rebuilt, and it certainly wants it—and so to the commencement of Cambridge-road, where some of the latest town improvements are conspicuous, and one feature of these somewhat astonishes us. At the corner is St. Michael's-road, the buildings upon it being all of a public character. These are the offices of the Poor Law Guardians and the overseers, the English Presbyterian Church, the Royal Seamen and Marine Orphans' Schools, and St. Michael and All Saints' Church. There is some approach to uniformity of design about these buildings, the general effect of which is heightened by all being built of brick with stone facings. If not very remarkable, they are all handsome structures, and what can rarely be said in such cases, they have all been built with a due regard to economy and efficiency, if we may be allowed this very Parliamentary expression. It is not these buildings, however, that cause our astonishment. This feeling is reserved for the Officers' Recreation Ground, which abuts on the two roads, and round which extensive earthworks have been thrown up, not to resist the advance of some possible foe, but merely to intercept the gaze of curious spectators. Considering that the military authorities have for years been engaged in levelling the old fortifications, it seems surprising that this particular form of eccentricity should have been permitted. From the inside of the grounds the sloping earthworks have certainly a pretty appearance, but their aspect from the roadway is extremely objectionable, if not positively repulsive. At the opposite side of the road is the nearly completed official residence of the Lieutenant-Governor, which is to supersede the Government House in the High-street. Probably on the score of comfort and convenience it will be all that an official residence can reasonably be expected to be; but to outward estimation it is an unsightly structure. The spacious grounds which surround it will, when tastefully laid out, add to the general effect.

Still pursuing the same direction, we shall now leave Commercial-road, the continuation of which is called Cambridge-road, and to the Officers' Recreation Ground succeeds that of the non-commissioned officers and men. It stretches on this side from Burnaby-road, at the corner of which is the gymnasium, to St. George's-road, the corner of which is occupied by the Grammar School. This building is included in our sketches, and its history is deserving of a brief description. In 1732 William Smith, M.D., bequeathed to trustees, "Virtuti et literis sacrum," the freehold of a small farm in the Isle of Wight, and a small school was established and carried on in Portsmouth for many years on the proceeds of the rental of this farm. In process of time, however, not a single boy remained on the foundation, and successive Head Masters continued to receive the income from the estate for seventy years. The intervention of the Court of Chancery was invoked in 1815, but it was not until 1822 that effect was given to the Lord Chancellor's decision. The school was resuscitated, but it again fell into decay; and in 1874, when the Endowed Schools Commission visited Portsmouth, they found the school-room unoccupied, and not a single boy being educated on the foundation, although the master continued to pocket his stipend with unfaltering regularity. The Commissioners prepared a scheme, an effective Governing Body was appointed, and the War Office Board conceded the present commanding site for the sum of £2000. The school was built, and formally opened on Jan. 16, 1879. So rapid was the rise of the school—it started with 80 scholars, and now has 260—that the building has already had to be enlarged; and it is intended to build the Head Master (Mr. A. W. Jerrard) a residence, as soon as the Governing Body feel justified in incurring the outlay.

We now enter the historic High-street, of which our Artist supplies two sketches, one showing Government House, the residence of the Lieutenant-Governor of Portsmouth, Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, the General commanding the Southern Division; and the other the house at the door of which George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, was assassinated by John Felton, Aug. 23, 1628. The Duke was in conversation with Sir Thomas Fryer, when Felton stabbed him over the shoulder, the knife penetrating the heart. "The villain has killed me," exclaimed the Duke, and, pulling out the weapon, he fell dead. So sudden and noiseless was the occurrence, that the bystanders at first thought the Duke had been seized with an apoplectic fit, but on seeing the blood flowing from his breast and mouth the greatest excitement prevailed, and the Duchess of Buckingham and the Countess of Anglesey, who were in the house at the time, were carried shrieking to their apartments. Felton does not seem to have been noticed at the moment, but a man's hat was found near the door, and in the crown of it was sewn a paper, on which was written:—"That man is cowardly, base, and deserveth not the name of a gentleman or souldier, that is not willing to sacrifice his life for the honour of his God, his King, and Country. Let no man commend me for doing of it, but rather discommmend themselves as the cause of it, for if God had not taken away our hearts for our sinnes he would not have gone so long unpunished.—Jo. Felton." Felton was found in the kitchen, and at once gave himself into custody. It is related of him that on one occasion, being offended by a gentleman, he cut a piece off his own finger, and, inclosing it with a challenge, sent it to him, to show how little he heeded pain, provided he could have revenge. He was kept in prison—having undergone several examinations—until November, and was executed, towards the end of the month, at Tyburn, his body being afterwards hung in chains on Southsea beach. A little higher up, on the same side as Buckingham House, is the George Hotel, a famous hostelry in the old coaching days, and still the head-quarters of the London or Brighton and Portsmouth coach, when that costly pastime is indulged in by gentlemen "whips." Still higher up the High-street is intersected by a road which leads to Southsea Common in one direction, and to the Dockyard in the other. A few yards down this latter road, or Lombard-street as it is called, is St. Thomas's Church, the mother church of the town, and containing some interesting memorials. If not quite satisfactory to modern ecclesiastical notions, it is still a spacious and picturesque structure, as will be seen from the view we give of it. There is a monument in the chancel to the Duke of Buckingham, containing an inscription which may, without violence to anybody's feelings, be described as fulsome. Perhaps, however, the most interesting memorial is the register, illuminated on vellum, of the marriage of Charles II. with Catherine of Braganza, which is in the vestry. Charles was not married at St. Thomas's Church, but at the Government Chapel, on the Grand Parade, now the site of the Garrison Church, on May 21, 1662. Catherine landed at Portsmouth, a considerable fleet having assembled at Spithead to do her honour, and the scene is described in the chronicles of the time as remarkably gay and animated. "The Queen," says Evelyn, "arrived with a train of Portuguese ladies in their monstrous fardingales, or guard-infantas; their complexions olivador, and sufficiently disagreeable; her Majesty in the same habit; her foretop long, and turned aside very strangely. She was yet of the handsomest countenance of all the rest, and though low of stature, prettily shaped; languishing and excellent eyes; her teeth wronging her mouth by sticking a little too far out; for the rest lovely enough."

In these days of reckless balloon ascents—if we may be permitted a somewhat violent transition—we may introduce a story, showing how history repeats itself. The tower of St. Thomas's Church is 120 ft. high, at the summit of which is a dome surmounted by a large gilt ship, full-rigged. From this giddy height a Mr. Murray once launched himself in a species of parachute, reaching the ground in safety; but he met with his death in attempting to repeat the experiment at Chichester Cathedral. Turning again into the High-street we encounter the Guildhall, a shabby-looking edifice, which is part market-house and part Townhall. It dates from 1837, being partly built by subscription, and already the site for a new and commodious Townhall has been secured, by arrangement with the War Office, in the vicinity of the Town Station. Not many doors off is the Soldiers' Institute, inseparably associated with the name of Miss Robinson, "the soldier's friend." It cannot lay claim to any architectural pretensions, inasmuch as it simply consists of several large dwelling-houses joined together; but it has been so greatly altered and improved that it may fairly be spoken of as a commodious and handsome building. It is open to soldiers and sailors free, though all refreshments—these are of a non-intoxicating character—have to be paid for. The tariff is extremely moderate, and the Institute is kept in excellent condition. Miss Robinson is a very active philanthropist; and, as she has many willing coadjutors, a perfect network of agencies—social, moral, and religious—is kept in full swing. The Institute was not in existence at the time of the last review, and it should be one not of the least attractive objects to our volunteers next week. Just round the corner is the Grand Parade, with the old Guard House, the last remaining piece of the old fortifications, and the Garrison Church, at the furthest corner, and a little to the rear of the line of houses. The present edifice, of which we give a sketch, has been restored almost to the extent of being entirely rebuilt. The old "Domus Dei," as it was called, was originally part of a hospital founded by De Rupibus, Bishop of Winchester, in 1238. In the time of Henry VIII. it fell into the hands of the Government, when the whole of the buildings, with the exception of the chapel, were taken down. The latter was ever after used by the troops in garrison, and it is now styled the Royal Garrison Church. The burial ground surrounding it is filled with the ashes of heroes, chief amongst which may be mentioned that great soldier, the conqueror of Scinde, Sir Charles James Napier; a plain stone monument outside and a stall in the church itself are the only visible memorials of his greatness. The High-street terminates at the entrance to Victoria, or Portsmouth Pier, and the roadway here, taking a turn almost at right angles, runs for a short distance, until it is stopped at the point where the floating-bridge crosses the harbour. This bridge, of which our Artist gives a sketch, is always an object of interest to visitors who see it for the first time. It is as firm and almost as solid as a piece of the roadway, and the heaviest trucks and vehicles of every description, with their horses attached, are driven straight upon it without the slightest difficulty. A thousand soldiers, without their impedimenta, can be conveyed at one time; and as a matter of fact, whole contingents are constantly taken across in passing to and fro between the forts on both sides of the harbour. In addition to the floating-bridge there are numerous small steam-launches, which convey passengers across every few minutes, the uniform charge both of bridge and launches being one penny.

It is time now that we turned our attention to Southsea, which is not only one of the most popular seaside resorts in the kingdom but also one that has undergone a most remarkable development. Within living memory it was an insignificant offshoot of the old town, and even to this day the older inhabitants still call it, half jestingly, "the village." Some thousands of handsome houses now occupy ground, much of which a few years ago was a wilderness of swamp and morass; and though the "speculative" builders have of late had to pull up a little, they are still fairly employed. We referred above to the intersection of the High-street, near St. Thomas's Church, one arm of which (Pembroke-road) leads to Southsea. Turning down this road, we quickly reach the Governor's-green, which faces the Royal Naval Club at one side, and has the Royal Garrison Church at the other or western end. Along two of its sides are what remain of the old fortifications, and from these lines a capital view can be obtained of the troops as they march to and from church on Sundays. A very few yards further we reach the beginning of the Common. Away to the immediate right of us, and quite at the water's edge, Cawte's Hotel and Assembly Rooms, and the Southsea Clarence Esplanade Pier. The last is the spot where visitors most do congregate during the season, and where the splendid bands of the regiments composing the garrison play nightly, and on alternate afternoons. Our Artist has done no injustice to the scene, but his sketch serves to remind us of its one artistic disadvantage. Not only this extreme corner of it, but the whole beach, and, in fact, the entire town, lie low and flat, the consequence being that no bird's-eye view or panoramic picture of Portsmouth conveys anything like an adequate idea of its real attractiveness. The Clarence Esplanade Pier has, within the last two or three years, been extended and improved at a cost of about £8000; but, stimulated by the rivalry of the new South Parade Pier, a mile lower down the beach and in the heart of East Southsea, it has been resolved to spend an additional £10,000 in the erection of a large and handsome glass and iron Pavilion, the ground for which will be obtained by an extension of the Pier in an easterly direction. The work has already been commenced, and is to be finished during the approaching summer. Standing on this Pier, and looking westward, we have a view of the mouth of Portsmouth Harbour, of the Clarence Victualling Yard (on the Gosport side); of Haslar Naval Hospital, with its 2000 beds; and of Fort Monckton, at the furthest point. Straight in front of the Pier is the town of Ryde, the coast of the Island stretching at great length in both directions; while before us, on the Solent, are the three iron-clad forts which form an addition to the sea-defences of Portsmouth. From this Pier, as also from the Harbour Station, steamers, which are the property of the railway companies, ply frequently between the Island and the mainland. Leaving the Pier, and proceeding along the beach, which is studded with naval and military monuments, and captured guns, we come to Southsea Castle, a stronghold originally built in the time of Henry VIII., partially destroyed by an explosion of gunpowder in 1759, and rebuilt in 1814. It now affords accommodation for 200 men, and has, besides, apartments for officers. The fortress proper is approached by a winding passage and drawbridge, leading to a gateway, above which are the arms of Charles II. Since the Castle was rebuilt, it has been surrounded by a high brick wall, having a wide gateway opening on to the Common. There is a capital carriage-drive along the beach and behind the Castle, but pedestrians prefer to keep close to the sea, a macadamised footpath conducting them close past the Castle until the open beach is again reached. A little further on is the new South Parade Pier, to which we have just referred, with its handsome pavilion and splendid sea view. A mile beyond this point, passing Limps Fort by the way, at the very extremity of Portsea Island, are the fine barracks of the Royal Marine Artillery at Eastney and Fort Cumberland. Southsea Common is Government property, and on it the troops of the garrison are constantly exercised and drilled. It is also the scene of frequent reviews of the regulars; and on the Queen's birthday the whole of the troops in garrison are turned out upon it, the customary evolutions terminating at noon precisely with a feu de joie. The Common, down to a comparatively recent date, was covered with furze and in a generally unkempt condition; but, with the aid of convict labour, it was brought eventually into comparatively good condition. We are told that in 1220 "the finest army England ever saw lay encamped here" under Hubert de Burgh, and in 1386 28,000 men were encamped here for some months. The whole of the army of England was reviewed on the Common by Edward IV. on May 26, 1475. Of Southsea itself, it is not necessary to say much. Like other fashionable watering-places it has many handsome houses, replete with modern improvements, but unlike them, it is distinguished by its large resident population of naval and military officers, with their families and belongings. This imparts a social prestige to the place, which probably makes it unique, and unquestionably gives it a stability and importance that can hardly be said to attach to places which are more dependent upon the whims and caprices of fashion.

Portsmouth Royal Dockyard, which, beyond all question, is the greatest establishment in the place, is situated in the old parish of Portsea, having its principal entrance on the Common Hard, to which reference has already been made. Certain parts of it are open daily to the public, who are conducted over the establishment in batches, under the charge of members of the Metropolitan police—the Dockyard being par excellence a Government establishment, and no local control over it being allowed. There are nearly 6000 men and boys constantly employed in the yard, and every description of iron ship-building and repairs is carried on within its walls. It is almost superfluous to say that the most improved machinery is employed, not forgetting the steam-hammers and the block-making apparatus. There are about a dozen of these steam-hammers in the main smithy, and not fewer than twenty throughout the yard. Since the question of lighting by electricity has come to the fore, a distinct establishment has been started in the dockyard, and it now supplies the electric light to all the ships of war requiring it, as well as carrying on experiments from time to time. Large as the present electric shop is, it is proposed to extend it, and experiments are now being made with the view of determining the best means of lighting the entire dockyard by electricity. The various establishments and stores throughout the yard are, in fact, so extensive that it would be impossible even briefly to indicate them all within our prescribed limits. Before the great extension works were begun in 1867, the yard covered about 118 acres, with twelve docks and five building-slips. The great steam-basin was opened by her Majesty on May 25, 1848; the steam factory was completed in 1849; and the foundry in 1861. We may remark, parenthetically, that there is a church in the yard, dedicated to St. Anne, which dates from 1785. The extension works cover ninety-six acres, of which sixty acres were reclaimed from the mud lands of the harbour. Between 700 and 800 convicts were for many years employed in excavating and making bricks used in the construction of the docks, of which 20,000,000 were made annually by machinery, and burnt in five of Hoffman's German kilns. Between 2000 and 3000 workmen were also employed by the contractors, Messrs. Leathes, Smith, and Co., who had over fourteen miles of railway laid down and fourteen locomotives in constant use. The original estimate of the work was two millions and a quarter, but what the actual outlay was we have been unable to ascertain. The great steam-basin, referred to above is 380 ft. by 260 ft., its area being 2½ acres. It is small in comparison with the repairing basin in the extension works, the dimensions of which are 1323 ft. by 700 ft., its area being twenty-two acres. The rigging and fitting basins cover an area of thirty acres, the depth from the copings to the bottom of the basins being 40 ft. The water in the basins at spring tides (high water) is 36 ft., which can be further raised, by means of enormous chain-pumps, to the coping level. Connected with the repairing-basin are two locks and four dry docks, each measuring 500 ft. in length.

The antiquity of Portsmouth dockyard goes almost as far back as that of the town itself. In the reign of King John, according to the volume of "Close Rolls," edited by the Record Commissioners, the following Royal mandate was issued:—"The King to the Sheriff of Southampton, &c.—We order you without delay to cause our docks at Portsmouth to be inclosed with a good strong wall, in such manner as our beloved and faithful William Archdeacon of Taunton will tell you, for the preservation of our ships and galleys; and likewise to cause pent-houses to be made to the same walls, in which all our ships' tackle may be safely kept; and use as much dispatch as you can in order that the same may be completed this summer, lest in the ensuing winter our ships and galleys and their rigging incur any damage by your default, and when we know the cost it shall be accounted to you.—20th May, 14 John A.D." We sometimes laugh good-naturedly at the choice which Prime Ministers sometimes make of First Lords of the Admiralty; but fancy an Archdeacon being at the head of the "Queen's Navee!" Though chosen thus early as a naval arsenal, the yard at Portsmouth remained for centuries a comparatively small establishment. Down to 1650 it had no mast-house, no dry dock, not above a hundred shipwrights, and only one team of horses. Even in 1698 the only dock at Portsmouth was a wet dock.

The old and new Gun Wharves are at some distance south of the Dockyard proper, and project into the harbour on either side of the dam or pond which separates Portsmouth and Portsea. The old Gun Wharf, which is on the Portsea side, was begun in 1662 by one William Shakespeare, and the Shakespeare Head, in Bishop-street, was so-called, it is said, from the workmen being paid there. The Armoury was built in 1797 for the reception of 21,000 stand of arms. The "new" Gun Wharf, as it is called, dates back to 1797, in which year it was commenced on land reclaimed from the Camber, and consolidated with earth excavated from the south dock. The work was completed in 1814. Three years earlier the large storehouse was begun, the foundation-stone being laid by H.R.H. the Duke of Clarence. There is an enormous accumulation of shot and shell here; and the guns range from 3-pounders to 38 tons. Besides specimens of every known kind of musket, carbine, and rifle, the great armoury has racked 21,000 stand of Henry-Martini rifles, ready to be issued at a moment's notice.

In dealing with these Royal establishments, it is not undesirable that we should take some notice of Royalty itself. Portsmouth has often been honoured with Royal and illustrious visitors, and some of these occasions have a genuine interest. George III. paid a visit to the town on June 23, 1773, entering by the Landport gate, where he was received with a triple discharge of 232 pieces of cannon, mounted on the ramparts of Portsmouth, at Blockhouse Fort, and at Southsea Castle. As a matter of course, the Corporation, with whom was included the Recorder, waited upon his Majesty with a loyal address, and had the honour of kissing the King's hand. His Majesty made a thorough inspection of the Dockyard and of the Fleet at Spithead, during his five days' stay, and, on leaving, caused £1500 to be distributed to the artificers in the Dockyard; £350 to the crews of the Barfleur and Augusta yachts, and also the crew of his Majesty's barge; besides the sum of £250 to the poor of Portsmouth, Portsea, and Gosport. His Majesty also knighted five naval officers, and, finally, was "pleased to release the prisoners confined in Portsmouth Jail for debt." Queen Victoria's first visit to her chief naval arsenal was paid on Feb. 28, 1842, and it seems to have been the occasion of a good deal of pomp of the antique sort. Her Majesty was preceded by the Lords of the Admiralty and the Duke of Wellington, who took up their quarters at the George Hotel. The garrison, of course, turned out on duty; and shortly after noon the Queen, with an escort of Scots Greys, made her appearance. Upon the arrival of the procession at the Lion Gate the Queen was met by the Lieutenant-Governor, Sir Hercules Pakenham, with staff, who went through the ceremony of presenting the keys of the garrison to her Majesty, the keys being the same as were presented to the Prince Regent in 1814. On entering the gate the cortège was received with the usual salute from the batteries and the ships in harbour; and, after a déjeuner in the Dockyard, her Majesty, Prince Albert, the Duke of Saxe-Coburg, the Duke of Wellington, and other illustrious personages visited the St. Vincent, 120, the flag-ship of Sir E. Codrington. On board the ship, as we are informed, "the Queen recognised some of the seamen who were on board her yacht when, as Princess Victoria, she was, with the Duchess of Kent, staying at Norris Castle." The next day the Royal party visited H.M.S. Queen, lying at Spithead, and the very interesting account which follows we take from "Annals of Portsmouth," by Mr. W. H. Saunders, published in 1880 by Hamilton, Adams, and Co.:

"As the Royal party crossed the jetty a drizzling rain was falling, and it was noticed by all how gallantly the hero of a hundred fights held his umbrella over the head of his Sovereign. Arrived on board, as the Royal party were going down one of ladders, the Duke of Wellington slipped, and shook the plume out of his cocked hat, which was picked up by Miss Codrington, who, rolling it in her handkerchief, said to the Duke: 'Your Grace must not expect to have this again.' 'Ah!' said the Duke, 'I lose many things this way; I suppose you must keep it.' After visiting the cabin, her Majesty was shown the store-rooms, and the tiers and cockpit of the ship, which were brilliantly lighted with lanterns and variegated lamps. The bulkhead of the gun-room having been previously tried up, the lower deck was seen from stem to stern to the greatest advantage, and this splendid battery of 32 and 68-pounders drew from the Queen the remark, 'This is indeed grand; this is very fine.'

"On returning to the quarter-deck, her Majesty expressed a wish to see the ship's company at their dinner. As soon as it was ready, and the grog served out, the Royal party went below. As their Sovereign stepped on the lower deck the men stood up, and, although her Majesty kindly desired that they might be seated, they continued standing during her progress round the deck. On arriving opposite the table abreast the mainmast, her Majesty intimated to Captain Rice her desire to taste the grog. The gallant Captain immediately ordered a glass to be brought; but the Queen said, 'No; I wish to taste it as the men have it.' A mess-basin was filled from the grog-can on the nearest table, and presented by Captain Rice on his knee. Her Majesty, having tasted it, smilingly remarked that it was very good, and, taking a second sip, returned the basin. At another table further forward she inquired what they had for dinner. On being told beef and soup, she desired to have some of the latter, which was also presented by Captain Rice in a basin, with one of the iron spoons of the mess. Her Majesty, after tasting it once or twice, remarked that it was 'very good, though rather hot,' and as she returned it said it smelt well. At this moment the boatswain's call announced 'Attention!' which was instantly answered by every man giving, 'Her Majesty's health—God bless her.' Three cheers then followed from a thousand voices, which brought a tear to the eyes of her Majesty, but it quickly gave place to a smile. This was followed by the health of Prince Albert, with the same vociferous compliment."

King Louis Philippe visited Portsmouth two years later, and had a very cordial reception. What, however, was most noticeable at this period was the utterly defenceless condition of Portsmouth itself. Blockhouse Fort had not a single gun mounted. Fort Monckton, which held command of Spithead, had a few obsolete 18 and 24-pounders. Neither the Round Tower nor Point battery had a gun in them, and both were in a ruinous condition. The Platform battery mounted twenty-one long 6-pounders, very old pieces, which would have been shattered with a full-service charge, and were only used for salutes. Three old 32-pounders at the other end were scarcely of more use. The Spur battery was without guns; and the King's bastion had four 32-pounders mounted, one of which blew to pieces from its muzzle two fine young artillerymen while a salute was being fired, on the afternoon of the French King's visit. Southsea Castle, the key of the harbour channel, had six or eight 18-pounders, all told. Cumberland Fort, after all the money spent on it, was found to be out of range of shipping well out to sea, and only useful for shore defence, and as a protection to Langstone Harbour. The French are said to have been astonished at what they saw; and, at any rate, no time was lost after this in putting Portsmouth into a good defensive condition, millions of money being spent upon this object.

The defences of Portsmouth claim special attention from their magnitude and strength. There are two lines of forts, the outer and the inner, the latter being designated "Palmerston's Folly," from the fact that they were condemned as practically useless before they were completed; and, indeed, two or three of the forts on the east of the Hilsa lines never were constructed. It is obvious, even to the non-professional mind, that an enemy, once in possession of the outer forts on Portsdown Hill, would have the Hilsa lines and Portsmouth itself entirely at its mercy; so that it is marvellous any one ever conceived the idea of this inner line of forts, still less that Parliament should have sanctioned it. For the purpose of the forthcoming review, it may be as well to observe that the forts will be deemed non-existent, and two of them, Forts Widley and Southwick, will be filled with thousands of spectators, who may at least count upon a tolerable view of the march-past at the end of the day. The inner lines being worthless, we need not stay to describe them. The outer line is thus composed, beginning at the eastern side, near the village of Havant, Forts Purbrook (or Crookhorn), Widley, Southwick, Nelson, Wallington, and Fareham. These forts, though varying a little both in size and shape, are sufficiently alike for a description of one to suffice for all. Fort Widley, which for its central position and the fact that it is adjacent to the main road into Portsmouth, is used as head-quarters when troops garrison Portsmouth, has an outer ditch, scarp, and counter-scarp. The roads leading to the entrances are enfiladed from the gorge casemates. There are two mortar batteries, east and west; three caponnières, east, west, and north, with flanking galleries. Upon the terreplein twenty-eight guns can be mounted, and here, above the slope, are situated artillery stores, arms, expense magazines, fuze-fixing-rooms, &c. The fort has accommodation for six officers, five staff sergeants, 210 men, and stabling for two horses. There are subterranean passages, so that in the event of the ramparts being carried by the enemy, the defenders could retreat to the redan, or keep, and make a further stand, at the same time blowing up the outer works. Under the parade-ground is a huge tank, capable of holding 84,000 gallons of water, the supply being pumped from the Portsmouth Waterworks Company's reservoirs. It may surprise many to know that none of the guns are yet mounted in position, although a considerable number of 7-in. rifled breechloading guns have been deposited outside the different forts in preparation for this essential step. Altogether, provision is made for the mounting of 262 guns, including fourteen for the Farlington redoubt, and additions could be made to this number in the event of actual hostilities. At Forts Widley, Southwick, and Purbrook the barrack portion is built in two storeys, one on the area and the other on the ground floor; while at the other forts the quarters are all on the basement, the cubical space allowed being 600 ft. per man. Comparatively insignificant as the forts appear to the spectator at a distance, they are really of great size, Fort Widley being 750 ft. deep—i.e., from north to south—and 1050 ft. long, altogether covering a space of over seventeen acres. The brickwork is very massive; the excavations considerable, and therefore costly. It is popularly said that the double line of forts has cost over £11,000,000, and there is nothing improbable in the conjecture. The forts to the west of the town, on the Gosport side, though included in the inner line, are, nevertheless, of use as a portion of the harbour defences. They consist of Forts Elson, Brockhurst, Rowner, Grange, and Gomer; while on the south are Forts Monckton, Blockhouse, Southsea Castle, and Forts Lumps and Cumberland. Lastly, in the Solent are the circular ironclad forts known as Spit Fort, Horse Fort, St. Helen's Fort, and Norman Fort.

Portsmouth Harbour, extending some seven miles inland, is one of the finest natural harbours in the world. Almost in the middle, on the western side, is Portchester Castle, an old Norman pile, quadrangular in form, surrounded by about four or five acres of ground. The walls are from eight to twelve feet thick, and about eighteen feet high, having in many places a passage round them, covered with a parapet. It has eighteen towers of various sizes, including the keep; and on the inside, over the western entrance-gate, are two projecting figures, somewhat resembling Egyptian sphinxes. The great tower is lofty, and contains two vaults at the bottom, with the remains of three double apartments above them. Parts of the Castle have been rebuilt, and it is in a state of ruin; but it still displays many specimens of Saxon architecture. The publicans of Portchester and Southwick enjoy the peculiar privilege, under charter from Queen Elizabeth, of being exempted from having soldiers billeted on them or quartered in their houses.

The ships in harbour are necessarily a fluctuating quantity, and it will be sufficient to specify those the chief of which are included by our Artist in his Sketch. The Duke of Wellington is the flag-ship of Admiral Ryder, who is Commander-in-Chief of the port; the Asia is the guard in reserve ship, which flies the flag of the Admiral-Superintendent of the Dockyard; the Excellent is the gunnery-ship, and the Vernon is employed in connection with torpedo practice. The St. Vincent is one of the old-fashioned line-of-battle ships, and is used as a boys' training-ship; while, most famous of all, is the Victory, on which Nelson received his death-wound at glorious Trafalgar. The fatal spot is marked by a brass-plate with the simple inscription, "Here Nelson fell." The Marlborough training-ship for engineer students is moored in the dockyard. Nelson was so familiar with the old town that it is impossible to avoid some reference to his connection with it. His last embarkation at Portsmouth, on Sept. 14, 1805, is, as one of the chroniclers has it, a scene worthy of Grecian history. Nelson arrived at the George Hotel, in the High-street, at six o'clock in the morning, and breakfasted. An immense crowd had assembled in front of the hotel, and to avoid their too pressing attention Nelson slipped out at the back, and was soon on the Common. The eager crowd, however, was quickly in pursuit, and there ensued such a hand-shaking as the world seldom witnesses. "I wish I had two hands," said the hero, "and then I could accommodate more of you"; to which the crowd shouted in reply, "God bless you, Nelson." "And there on Southsea beach," says Mr. Saunders, "near the spot where the old Victory's anchor stands, as the boat pushed from the shore, the people ran into the water once more to grasp that one hand of his, and to wish him God speed." It is curious to read that only a couple of years before this the press-gang was in full swing at Portsmouth. Five or six hundred sailors would be detailed for this repulsive duty from the ships in harbour, and they would scour the streets, laying hands on all the serviceable men and boys they could find, though, as a matter of fact, the great majority of those captured had to be released on the score of physical unfitness. Nelson, who might have said soberly, what one of Mr. Gilbert's characters says in burlesque, "I am the monarch of the sea," does not seem to have been a hero on horseback, as the following letter, he addressed to Captain Locker, will show:—

"Portsmouth, April 21, 1784.
"Since I parted from you I have encountered a disagreeable adventure. Yesterday I was riding a blackguard horse that ran away with me at the Common, carried me round all the works into Portsmouth, by the London gates, through the town, and out at the gate that leads to the Common, where there was a waggon in the road, which is so very narrow that a horse could barely pass. To save my legs, and perhaps my life, I was obliged to throw myself from the horse, which I did with great agility, but, unluckily, upon hard stones, which has hurt my back and my leg, but done no other mischief. It was a thousand to one I had not been killed. To crown all, a young girl was riding with me, and her horse ran away with mine; but most fortunately, a gallant young man seized her horse's bridle a moment before I was dismounted, and saved her from the destruction which she could not have avoided."

The beach at Point, opposite the mouth of the harbour, was often alive with bustle and excitement during those war times, and a terrible accident occurred here on the 24th of June, 1809, which may be recounted. An old Irish woman was washing near where the baggage of some troops lay on the beach, when another soldier's wife, who was smoking, asked her if she would take a whiff. She complied, but finding the tobacco would not burn, she struck the bowl of the pipe against the ground, when some of the tobacco fell out, and set fire to some loose powder that was scattered about. This, in turn, communicated itself to a cask of powder, and a fearful explosion ensued. Many men were blown into the sea, arms and legs flying over the roofs of the houses in all directions, and a great destruction of property ensued. The precise number of persons killed was never known, but it could not have been less than from thirty to forty, while the woman who was the cause of the calamity escaped uninjured.

Many French prisoners were taken during this period, and, in 1813, the number in Portsmouth and the neighbourhood was estimated at about 18,000. Of these, 4000 were at Forton, 5000 at Portchester, and about 9000 in the harbour. They were always treated with the utmost kindness, and they appear to have produced a very satisfactory impression in return. They were never idle, and displayed much skill and ingenuity in carving models of ships, chessmen, and other articles out of beef bones; and they earned a little pocket-money by weekly sales of braided workboxes, and of dinner-mats, made from the dyed straws served out to them to sleep upon. They were rather prone to quarrelling amongst themselves; and one man, who killed a comrade with his knife, was found guilty of murder at the Winchester assizes. It is related that the whole of his fellow-prisoners were marched from Portchester Castle under a strong guard to witness his execution.

These stories of the time of the Great War would fill a volume. We will only shortly narrate one of the incidents which is strictly in keeping with the event of next week. On July 4, 1801, a grand review of Regulars, Militia, and Volunteers took place on Portsdown Hill in honour of his Majesty's birthday. Altogether, about 6000 troops assembled on the ground; and, after giving a general salute, the artillery of the line fired three rounds from right to left, which was followed by a feu de joie. The officers and men, uncovered, gave three cheers; and, at the firing of the last gun, the line formed into companies, and marched past General White Locke, and then to their respective barracks. About two months later, the following episode, characteristic of those times, occurred. Just as people were leaving the various places of worship one Sunday evening, the firing of beacons announced that the French invading flotilla was at sea. All was bustle and preparation for war, both with the ships at Spithead, and on shore. Thousands of the inhabitants, old and young, were sworn in as volunteers; and yeomanry and cavalry poured into the town from the surrounding district. Three cannon-shots were to be fired as a signal if the enemy appeared; but with daylight, the fact was disclosed that all these hasty preparations were a mere ruse to test the loyalty of the people, and the military resources of the garrison.

The casual visitor to Portsmouth cannot help being struck with the few indications of industrial enterprise which meet the eye. As a matter of fact, for so large a town, Portsmouth has very little trade, as the term is usually understood; and, for a seaport, very little commerce. It would be possible to put in an ingenious plea on this score, but the explanation would not be entirely satisfactory. Brewing and stay-making are the two staple industries of the place—always excepting the building of war-ships, which is a Government affair, rather than a matter of private enterprise. Only within the last week or two a Government inquiry has been held into the merits of a new industry for the town. It has been discovered that the chalk at Portsdown-hill and the clay in the harbour will make a very excellent Portland cement, and a company has been formed for carrying on this work. But great opposition has been aroused amongst landowners and others, one result of which was the inquiry just noticed. The town has had its municipal boundaries recast within the last twelve months, the original half-dozen wards being divided, and apportioned into fourteen, with some regard to population and rateable value. The four towns, as they are called, of Portsmouth, Portsea, Landport, and Southsea are connected by an excellent system of tramways; and since the disappearance of the old fortifications the town has begun to display greater unity of feeling, if not approaching to uniformity of appearance. Finally, it may be truly said of Portsmouth that it is about the most orderly town in the United Kingdom, a result partly owing to the strict discipline to which a considerable portion of the population is subjected.

SPRING EXHIBITIONS.

THE SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS.

We intimated last week, in speaking generally of the spring exhibitions, that the present display in Suffolk-street seems hardly to reach the recent average. It is evident that the society is at a disadvantage through having to fill their large rooms twice in the year. Other causes, however, contribute to this result. The practice of art in this country has extended greatly in recent years; but, although a technical advance is perceptible, no fully commensurate improvement is discoverable; whilst the increased interest in art has probably developed exigent critical opinion in the public faster than it has produced good painters. It is, at all events, painfully obvious that many contributors to this gallery have mistaken their vocation; and that the market for art is at present glutted. The inference palpably is—and it should be taken timely to heart by all concerned—that none without irresistible impulse should rush thoughtlessly into a profession in which it is most difficult to win eminence; and in which without eminence even a modest livelihood is not easily obtained.

It would be superfluous to review the contributions to these rooms of the members of long-standing. Suffice it to say that there are landscapes of customary mark by G. Cole and J. Peel; as there are figure-subjects by Woolner, Cobbett, Haynes King, and others. Of the younger members, whose accession did much to strengthen the society in and after its threatened dissolution, several are absent on this occasion, and others are not at their best. Perhaps the most noteworthy picture in the rooms is Mr. W. C. Symons's "Polly my Wife and Polly my Ship" (230)—a young first mate of a sailing-vessel with one hand on a picture thereof, the other round the waist of a buxom lassie that is very deservedly the centre of interest—while messmates pledge their healths. The characters are well chosen and rendered and the execution is spirited. There is evidently the making of a very acceptable painter in the artist, whose unpretentious efforts exhibited here before we have eulogised. Mr. John Burr, the President of the society, brings a true sense of pictorial requirements in general effect, as understood in the Scotch school, with much executive ability to a subject that, if not trite, might well be more interesting and elevated—"The Village Barber" (125). There are sundry landscape studies of strong contrasted colour and effect in the manner of the Scotch "impressionists," as we may call them, by Messrs. White and Reid and Miss Flora Reid, which are taking enough in an exhibition, but of which one would soon tire. Mr. Edwin Ellis's coast scenes have affinity with the latter, but the abuse of evident power is more than ever apparent in their violent colouring and reckless handling. Mr. W. Holyoake evinces the possession of the colourist faculty in "The Lass that Loved a Sailor" (233), but more constant attention to drawing and modelling may be desiderated. Mr. Ludovici, sen., has a style and feeling that are artistic and even poetic, yet that partially fail to fulfil their promise from the same deficiency—see his "Ophelia" (278), and the moonlight scene illustrative of Heine in No. 350. The suggestive charm of the head entitled "Favorita" (53) is, however, incontestable. Most of the qualities displayed in "The Casbah, Algiers" (238), by Mr. Pavy, apparently points to the advantages of foreign training. "Preparations for Harvest Thanksgiving Service" (441) by Mr. Hayllar—rustics bringing wheat and barley, carrots, turnips, and sunflowers to decorate a village church, where if High Church observances have found their way, they have hardly yet brought in their train æsthetic fastidiousness, is amusing, if we may say so without irreverence. The characters, too, are well studied, and the painting clever if a little too clean or formal. Other figure-subjects of merit are contributed by Messrs. Ludovici, jun.—"Youth" (432); A. W. Bayes; J. Morgan; J. A. Fitzgerald; J. Gow—"Sunday Afternoon" (154); R. H. Gordon; H. H. Cauty—"In the Vale of Bessington, Exmoor" (244); P. Macnab—"Goodly Gleanings" (261); L. C. Henley—"A Private View in the Monastery" (264); F. H. Potter; Linnie Watt; J. C. Soden; A. G. Bell, and Maria Brooks. W. Logsdail, the Norwich artist, who made his mark two years back at the Academy after studying in the Antwerp Academy, has not benefited his art by going to Italy, if we may judge from the black shadows and absence of all sense of beauty in his street scene at Venice—No. 282.

Among the landscapes in the exhibition as much might probably be found worthy of comment did our space permit. But landscape art here is generally in the first stage of development; that is to say, it consists of direct transcripts from nature—marked by refinement in some cases, as in the works of James, and A. E. Grace, and in a higher degree in "The Closing Day" (500) by J. Aumonier; or noticeable for greater zest for colour, as in the contributions of Stuart Lloyd, T. Hines, and others. Yeend King's landscape, No. 336, in its more studied relations of tone shows a somewhat higher aim. The landscapes of H. Caffieri evince also distinct artistic feeling for pleasant interchange of broken hues. The agreeable coast and river scenes by G. S. Walters and Edwin Hayes are likewise entitled to respectful mention. But the work of this class that shows perhaps the closest observation and most accurate representation here is W. L. Wyllie's "Towing over the Tide" (483).

In animal painting a prominent place in the visitor's esteem will be won by Mr. J. Charlton for his spirited and animated "Gone to Ground" (194)—a pack of hounds rushing to the hole of a fox. Mr. Noble's "Sportsman's Friends" (143) strikes us as conventional in composition and treatment, and hardly redeems the promise of recent works. In architecture Mr. Wyke Bayliss is facile princeps here; but that is not saying very much: his works have sentiment, but his effects are frittery and his masonry lacks solidity. Nor must we forget to mention the small interiors by the Misses Hayllar—Miss Jessica especially—for their extremely minute finish and brilliant effect. Lastly, in the water-colour room there are a few drawings of merit and promise by Eliza Paget, Agnes M. Clausen, W. J. Wainwright, and several others. But the most striking, powerful work is "Morning Shadows: Merionethshire" (560), by Bernard Evans. If the sweeping curves of the valleys and hills and the consentaneous massing of the foliage are somewhat conventional they evince the sense of composition that we accept in Turner; and much may be expected from an artist who possesses a distinctive idiosyncrasy.

The exhibitions at the galleries of Mr. McLean and Messrs. Tooth contain, as usual at this season, oil-pictures by British and Foreign Artists in about equal proportion. Both collections consist largely of productions by popular painters which, when of fair quality, are of not sufficient importance to demand critical notice. A few exceptions, however, may be made. At Messrs. Tooth's there is a picture, by Bastian Lepage, of a rustic urchin with fishing-rod, which, while not without the painter's peculiar merits, exhibits his peculiar defects more markedly than the "Mendiant" at the French Gallery. There is boy-like character and expression in the face, but in the too equable dry grey hues the aerial perspective is brought, as it were, to the foreground, and the objects do not take their proper relative positions. At the head of the room is a large landscape by Mr. Leader, novel in subject and effect, especially for him, representing with striking force yellow sunlight shining with crystalline brilliance after a storm on a row of village cottages, and athwart a plashy road and wet sward. By Mr. F. Goodall there is a picture of importance, "Clearing the Sugar Cane, Lower Egypt." The "Ordered Off," by Mr. F. Holl, we are engraving, and therefore shall have another opportunity for reviewing. For the reason already given, it will suffice to add that there are pictures by F. Morgan, Macallum, P. R. Morris, Haywood Hardy, and other English painters; and, among the foreign works, "A Moonlight," by Douzette, and a clever small picture by Jimenez-y-Aranda.

At Mr. McLean's a lifesize figure of "The Daughter of Herodias," by Benjamin Constant, is selected for the post of honour. But it is not so acceptable as smaller works by this painter. In the latter his somewhat extravagant colouring becomes all in all; but we look for better draughtsmanship and completer modelling in a single figure on the scale of that before us. A small picture by De Nittis of a lady reclining in the stern of a moored boat under the shadow of an overhanging tree has exquisite qualities of art. Here, too, the well-known names of Luke Fildes, Vicat Cole, Boughton, P. R. Morris, F. Morgan, Schloesser, Fantin, Van Marcke, Munkacz, E. Frere, P. Billet, and P. Sadée are more or less well supported.

THE MAGAZINES FOR APRIL.

FIRST NOTICE.

The Cornhill contains one very masterly sketch, the description of the day's life of a young Neapolitan vagabond who earns his day's livelihood, when he earns it honestly, mainly by collecting cigar ends, a lad of the type of the beggar boys immortalised on Murillo's canvas—thoroughly southern, careless and happy amid external misery, preternaturally quick and intelligent, glowing with vivacity and passion, with every capacity for good, and little prospect of ever coming to any good. Another interesting contribution, on the State Trials, is full of instances of the harder and less picturesque, but morally less pernicious, conditions of life among the dangerous classes in our own country in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. "Talk and Talkers" contains some vivid portraits within the writer's own sphere of acquaintance; and Mr. Gosse's poetical allegory of modern dangers to the Church, drawn from Erasmus's account of his visit to the sand-choked shrine at Walsingham, is expressed in terse lines of no small poetical power. "No New Thing," the new story, justifies its title by giving every indication of proving a fiction of the Cornhill's ordinary quiet stamp.

Macmillan makes an addition to the "Battle of Dorking" class of literature by a sufficiently vivid and dramatic anticipatory narrative of the destruction of the French invader in the Channel Tunnel, involving, to the great relief of all quiet people, that of the tunnel itself. "Fortune's Fool" becomes more melo-dramatic with every instalment, but the writer's power of commanding attention is not impaired. Miss Probyn's verses are exceedingly pretty. Mr. Hyatt corrects an error respecting the death of Nelson, stereotyped in Southey's classical biography. Mr. Turner's essay on Tourgueniev is good and sound, but adds little to our information. Mr. Gunton has little to tell respecting Elizabeth's residence at Hatfield during her sister's reign; and Mr. Stuart Glennie, professing to contribute "traditional and personal memorials" of the two Mills, has nothing to tell.

Blackwood has two contributions of exceptional importance—an account of Fenianism, by an ex-Fenian leader, who seems thoroughly conversant; and a description of the virtual annexation of Beloochistan, which, if the writer's statements may be trusted, the Indian Government have quietly effected by inducing the Khan of Khelat to allow his dominions to be administered by English officers. If as loyal to the British connection as represented, the Beloochees will undoubtedly form a strong bulwark to our Indian empire. "The Syrian Subjects of the Porte," draws a melancholy picture of the general decay of the Ottoman empire, while suggesting the probability of a general outbreak of fanaticism. One remarkable statement is the rapid increase of Jewish immigration into Palestine, not, unfortunately, of a reputable description.

The Jews are also the subject of a noteworthy article in the Century, which seeks to extenuate the persecution they have experienced by the usual charges of usurious practices, particularly in connection with their own societies, which are represented as combinations for despoiling Christians by every means of chicanery. The writer, however, admits that these abuses might be effectually restrained by Russian law, which seems to connive equally at the rapacity of one race and the ruffianism of the other. Another paper investigates the question whether Lord Beaconsfield can be considered a fair representative of the Jewish race, which is resolved in the affirmative. Mr. A. Lang's essay on Matthew Arnold is a model of intelligent and sympathising criticism, almost bright enough to counteract the depressing influence of the unspeakably lugubrious portrait prefixed to it. Mrs. Mitchell's tasteful and genial sketch of "The Age of Praxiteles" is, on the other hand, beautifully illustrated. The contribution most interesting to English readers, in a capital number of Harper's, is an excellent account, with illustrations, of Mr. Gladstone at Hawarden. "Spanish Vistas" is full of charming sketches, both by pen and pencil, chiefly from Madrid and Burgos.

The Nineteenth Century, beginning with a protest against the Channel Tunnel, terse, weighty, and signed by the first names in the country, dwindles down to a discussion whether Agnostics should go to church. The most important stages on the road are Lord Sherbrooke's argument against bi-metallism, and Dr. Siemens' seductive theory of the machinery employed by nature for maintaining the sun's heat and light. In Dr. Siemens' view, space is occupied by a gaseous atmosphere, continually drawn in to feed the solar fires, and continually discharged to return again, thus maintaining a perpetual circulation. The very curious "heathen apocalypse" commented upon by Professor Zeller is an Egyptian document of the fourth century, when Pagans yet hoped that the downfall of the old religion would be but temporary. Dr. Nevin tells the story of Monsignor Campello's secession from a Protestant point of view; and Mr. Justice Stephen expounds the principles of English criminal law as a preliminary step towards its codification.

Three hundred and fifty heads of families, representing capital to the amount of over £100,000, left Liverpool by last week's Canadian steamer for Manitoba, for the purpose of settling in the north-west territory westward of Brandon; and 500 more will leave soon for a like purpose.

At Seaham Harbour, on Thursday week, the annual sale of superior pedigree Clydesdale horses, Shetland ponies, and half-breeds, the property of the Marquis of Londonderry, took place. The Shetlands realised £876, the Clydesdales £1796, and the half-breeds £403; making a total of £3075.

POSSIBILITIES.

The interest of life depends in a great measure on its possibilities. Man is so formed that he cannot rest in the present; neither can he give up hoping. He "never is but always to be blest;" and to this peculiarity in the human constitution is due the enormous activity of the world. The cynic, indeed, perched upon his eminence, looks down, and asks what is the use of all this hubbub, and whether life be worth living? The inquiry shows an essentially morbid nature. The life bestowed upon us is no mean gift to be sneered at for its littleness, or trifled with because of its brevity. Those of us who believe that its worth is inestimable, since its possibilities are illimitable and eternal, may be well grateful for a gift so noble; but, looking at it from the standpoint of the newspaper rather than from that of the pulpit, how rich it is in interest and beauty for all who know how to use it. In one sense, indeed, man is born to trouble, born to physical pain, born to mental sufferings which demand all his courage and faith. His path is crowded with obstacles through which he is forced to cut his way. It is true that there is no rest for him upon this side the grave; but the joy of conquest gives vigour, and every difficulty swept away makes his path the brighter. In the brave man's dictionary there is, in truth, no such word as impossible; he is resolute to conquer, and in nine cases out of ten resolution wins the day.

In a free country like England, and in the splendid English colonies which are a part of ourselves, and, in some respects perhaps, the best part, there is no limit to the possibilities of a young man's future. The world is all before him where to choose; and, with health, hope, and legitimate ambition—the three priceless possessions of the young—what may he not accomplish? We say legitimate ambition, for success in some directions really means failure, and that of the worst kind. To make money, for instance, is in most cases a necessity of existence. Without money, gained by himself, or gained by someone for him, no man can live at all, nor, indeed, can he be buried; since he must have food while living, and a "last home" when dead. The uses of money, as Charles Lamb has pointed out, are innumerable. Wealth is often impotent enough, but it often brings with it some of the highest pleasures we are capable of enjoying—cultivation of the mind, the society of books, converse with the wise and good, the study of nature and art, and the pleasure of benefiting our fellow-men. "Poverty's unconquerable bar" cramps the mind, frets the spirits, and hangs often as a dead weight upon a man. No one likes, or ought to like, to be dependent, and therefore one of the reasonable purposes of life is the acquisition of money. But great wealth is seldom to be desired; never, indeed, if it becomes a man's ruling passion, the main object to which he dedicates body and soul. That when he dies "he shall carry nothing away" is a fact the miser never willingly admits; and how the ruling passion clings to him even on his death-bed has been wittily exhibited by Pope:—

"I give and I devise (old Euclid said,
And sighed) my lands and tenements to Ned."
Your money, Sir! "My money, Sir! What, all!
Why, if I must—(then wept)—I give it Paul."
The manor, Sir! "The manor! hold," he cried,
"Not that—I cannot part with that!"—and died.

The man who resolves at all costs to get money generally succeeds, but the game is not worth the candle. Is the ambition of the man of letters more noble? The late Mr. Bagehot, who had himself done some admirable literary work, said not, deeming literary fame unworthy the pursuit of a wise man; but here, too, we must discriminate. Something great there must be, although possibly mixed with weakness, in a pursuit that leads a man to "scorn delights and live laborious days" in the hope, so strikingly expressed by Southey, that he may leave behind a name that will not perish in the dust. The infirmity, if it be one, has been strongly felt by poets, by none more strongly than the greatest—Shakespeare, whose sonnets utter, in no uncertain language, the belief that what he has written will live "so long as men can breathe, or eyes can see." It is certain that the man of letters, other things being equal, has a better chance of being remembered than the man of action. Great actors on the stage of life make a strong impression at the time, and do, perhaps, much good or evil. The world remembers their names, but is apt to forget their deeds:—

In vain they fought, in vain they bled;
They had no poet, and are dead.

To be a poet is, of course, not within the possibilities of life for most men. Dr. Blacklock, a friend of Dr. Johnson, declared, indeed, that there was not an axiom in Euclid more evident than the statement that poetry was easier work than lexicography, and that a poem could be written with much more facility than the same quantity of a dictionary; which reminds us of the old Cumberland dame who, upon hearing of Wordsworth's death, said that no doubt his widow would be able to carry on the business. The gift of poetry, like the genius which prompts the musical composer, the sculptor, and the painter, cannot be purchased with labour. But literature has splendid possibilities apart from its most exquisite form of expression, and many a generous nature has been allured by them, and deemed them nobler than the brilliant prizes offered in better recognised professions. Such an ambition, if well directed, is surely not unworthy. It is only good and great literature, the "life-blood" of finely endowed spirits, that contains the seeds of permanent vitality; only wise and rarely gifted authors, whose worth grows more precious with the procession of the years. Such authors are among the chief benefactors of the race, and to aim at following in their steps, if in some cases it evince more courage than discretion, does at least show that a high ideal is attempted.

A considerable number of persons—probably the larger number—are not stimulated by ambition. They want to enjoy life with as little trouble as possible, and so long as Fortune smiles upon them they are content. Men of this class do not agitate the world, but they help to rub off its angles and to make it pleasant. They like comfort better than greatness, and infinitely prefer the friendship and reputation that come to them while living to the prospect of being remembered twenty years after death. Who shall blame them? All men are not fitted to be martyrs, heroes, enthusiasts, or students. Such men may be the salt of the world; but salt, though an excellent condiment, can be only sparingly used for food. We want homely folk for homely, everyday uses—men and women who, if not deeply stirred by the possibilities life has to offer, are glad, at any rate, to make their little lives and the lives of those they love beautiful and harmonious. They do, perhaps, no noteworthy deeds, but they lead serene lives; they move in a narrow sphere, but their tiny plot of ground may be brilliant with sunshine and fragrant as the breath of spring flowers. Shall we, in conclusion, venture to make a confession? The heroism that stimulates to noble actions claims the profoundest admiration. We gaze upon heroes with wonder; but somehow heroes are too aggressive and too dogmatic to be always pleasant companions; and, such is our frailty! the dear gentle souls who live for the day, and, as Keble says, "sleep like closing flowers at night," manage generally to secure the larger portion of our love. ART BOOKS.

Æsthetics—we use the word as designating an important branch of mental science or philosophy, as a German would use it, and with no reference to the misappropriation of it by a small section of English society—æsthetics, we say, is not a popular study, and least so, probably, that division of it which deals with the principles of architecture. And yet Mr. Ruskin has shown that the study of the principles of architecture may be rendered inviting, and even fascinating. Another book is before us of which nearly as much may be said, although in some respects the character of mind and the method of the author are the very opposite of Mr. Ruskin's. The portly volume of 493 pages we refer to treats of The Nature and Function of Art, more especially of Architecture; and is by Leopold Eidlitz, architect (Sampson Low, Marston, Searle, and Rivington). Originally written for an American audience, the present edition has been modified; so that the whole of its references and allusions, with one or two exceptions, seem to have been prompted by English associations, and are addressed to an English public. The orthography, however, of certain words is American; but this may be according to a rule in the publisher's printing office—introducing, as this firm does, many American works little altered from their original guise—an objectionable practice; if, indeed, it is a practice. Mr. Eidlitz, like Mr. Ruskin, is fond of digressing into irrelevant questions—religious, ritualistic, political, ethical, social, and scientific. He is also didactic, dogmatic, and severe on other critics—especially on Mr. Ruskin for his fallacies, and Mr. Fergusson for his errors. But here the resemblance ends. He is innocent of the rhetorical artifices of Mr. Ruskin. Mr. Eidlitz' style is highly effective; but by quite other means—or possibly artifices also. His weapons are drawn from the armoury of logic, metaphysics, algebra, and mathematics. His reasoning is close, and seems cogent and conclusive, at least in technical form. His terse propositions are strung together with much art, and separately strike the reader as unquestionably just—happy discoveries that deserve to be quoted as aphorisms or axioms. Unfortunately, however, they are often, we suspect, like those proverbs which present a partial truth so pointedly that we are surprised into accepting it as the whole truth until we are confounded by the precisely opposite and contradictory proverb. In like manner, too, the inferences drawn from the premises appear to flow so easily and naturally, nay, inevitably, that we are hardly inclined to pause in order to reflect whether all this ingenious reasoning may not be, after all, but plausible specious sophistry. It may happen that the reader will get some distance through the book before he begins to discover that the author certainly has some strong prejudices, and a parti pris to which he is entirely committed. For ourselves, we cannot help thinking that this work—despite its manifest ability and learning, notwithstanding much that it contains which is true, and luminous, and important to know and to remember—exemplifies in a very remarkable degree the distinction between true wisdom and the mere logical faculty, or even the sagacity that concerns itself with relations of knowledge or ideas, without first inquiring whether they are merely minor or accidental relations. By wisdom we mean those powers of synthesis as well as analysis—all the faculties of the mind acting consentaneously—by which truth, so far as discoverable, is arrived at—the life-long habit of observation and reflection, ever eliminating prejudice and error, and orderly storing specific truths till the broadest and clearest view comes almost as by intuition. The gist of the author's argument seems to be somewhat as follows:—"Outside of positive knowledge there is a poetical knowledge, or the knowledge conveyed by art." The man of "common sense" can have no part in the latter; and not only this, but nobody must pretend to "taste" except the actual artist or architect who has "knowledge," ergo taste. Religion cannot exist without art symbol. Architecture should not be regarded as an affair of separate styles or fashions. There has been no architecture for the last five hundred years. To form a new and genuine architecture any of the forms of the old styles may be taken, provided only that they become part of and are made expressive of construction. Abstract proportion is a fallacy. To form the architecture of the future we must go back to the Gothic of the fourteenth century, which is equal to every requirement. Greek art was puerile; all classical art, including the Roman, was only fit for buildings one story high. The Renaissance style was not architecture at all. But we would pause to ask—if any forms may serve, why go back necessarily and exclusively to the Gothic? This would be doing exactly what the Renaissance architects did in respect to the classic; and they had still existing classic monuments as we have Gothic; yet the process resulted, according to Mr. Eidlitz, in their having no architecture at all. The dicta above given, detached from metaphysical jargon, and divested of ornate accompaniments, will be recognised as old acquaintance. It seems clear to us that the author's main object is, as a champion of the Gothic, to renew the battle of the styles. But to enter into such a contest would take us too far afield.

Visual Art; or, Nature through the Healthy Eye, with some remarks on Originality and Free Trade, Artistic Copy-right and Durability, by William Noy Wilkins (William H. Allen and Co.). We give the full title of this book because it may convey some idea of the incoherency of the rather querulous effusions of an apparently disappointed man. Mr. Wilkins may be favourably remembered as having years ago sought to introduce a new medium for painting called by him "Oil-Fresco," which was unquestionably right in theory; and for having recommended the exclusion of white lead from the artist's palette and all vegetable and other fugitive colours. Since then he has occupied himself with other inventions; but, we fear, to little practical result. In "Visual Art" the author again poses as a discoverer; but we are bound to say that the principles he enunciates are little more than elementary, and are known to every artist who has thought at all, while the public might well dispense with a hundred egotistical confidences or sweeping assertions as to the valuelessness of Government schools, modern pictures—one particular collection that sold at Christie's for £18,475 being estimated by Mr. Wilkins as not worth so many shillings—and other topics still more irrelevant.

Pencil and Palette, by Robert Kempt (Chatto and Windus), one of the pleasant volumes of light reading forming "The Mayfair Library"—may be almost adequately described in the words of the extended title, as "being biographical anecdotes, chiefly of contemporary painters, with gossip about pictures lost, stolen, forged, and discovered, also great picture sales." The book contains many little items of information culled from contemporary newspapers and other sources, which could not be readily found elsewhere.

Familiar Garden Flowers (Cassell, Petter, Galpin and Co.) contains forty coloured illustrations of so many of the best-known garden favourites, accurately "figured" by F. Edward Hulme, and accompanied by equally trustworthy botanical definitions of the flowers, general remarks on their history, character, and associations, and instructions for their culture by Shirley Hibbert. Such subjects so rendered and treated, together with good colour printing and a pretty exterior, combine to render this little book well adapted for the drawing-room table of a suburban villa.

Flower-Painting in Water-Colours, by F. Edward Hulme, F.L.S., F.S.A. (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin), contains practical directions addressed to beginners for painting about twenty of the most familiar flowers of the garden, hedgerow, and fields. The floral illustrations presented to be copied are excellent examples of colour-printing, being distinguished by purity of tint and truth of hue in a high degree.

A Short History of the British School of Painting, by G. H. Shepherd, may be commended to young students and others who may require a rudimentary book of reference of British artists, classed according to the branch of art they practised, and arranged in approximately chronological sequence. There are omissions, and opinions that might be questioned, and the information is very slight as regards our early masters; but this is compensated, perhaps, by the inclusion of many living painters.

The last publication of the Holbein Society is a facsimile (executed with the pen, and transferred to the stone) of the celebrated block-book the Ars Moriendi, from the copy in the British Museum, the only perfect one that has come down to us, and which was bought at the Weigel sale at Leipzig in 1872 for £1072 10s., exclusive of commission. The "Ars Moriendi" is one of the best illustrations of the style of art prevalent at the time of its production—i.e., about the middle of the fifteenth century. More we need not say to lovers of xylographic rarities and archaeology.

A "New Series" of "Illustrated Biographies of the Great Artists" is commenced with memoirs of Murillo and Meissonier (Sampson Low, Marston, Searle, and Rivington). The former, by Ellen E. Minor, is "based upon Stromer's 'Murillo, Leben und Werke,' which is an outline of a Spanish biography, by Tubino." Further details are derived from Stirling's "Annals of the Artists of Spain;" and Dr. Lübke's article in "Kunst und Künstler" has been "studied as an exhaustive treatise upon the spirit and character of Murillo's art." The authoress has turned to good account the slender materials at her command; her narrative is enriched from a wider range of art-reading than her modest preface would imply; and altogether the book is well calculated to carry out the intention of the whole series to which it belongs—viz., to supply popular information respecting the great masters, ancient and modern, and to reproduce in English the rich results of recent Continental research relative to the lives, works, and times of those masters. Of the biography of Meissonier, by J. W. Mollett, B.A., Officier de l'Instruction Publique (France), the author also of the "Life of Rembrandt" in this series, we cannot speak in equally favourable terms. It is a mere compilation from Théophile Gautier, Burty, Jules Claretie, René Ménard, the Gazette des Beaux Arts, &c. Though short, it contains many disconnected and hardly relevant digressions. Very much out of place is the comparison of English and French art (p. 57, et seq.); and still more so the absurd comparison of Millais and Meissonier—the two painters having absolutely nothing in common, and Meissonier himself presenting no art characteristic distinctively French. The biography is far from complete, and many of Meissonier's more important works are omitted. The "Dons Amis, 1856, for instance, is not named. Le Connoisseur is inaccurately styled "An Amateur of Pictures" (p. 35).

It will suffice to announce to all whom it may concern—little folk in the nursery and children of a larger growth—that a new edition has been published (Frederick Warne and Co.) of the Book of Nonsense, which has made Mr. Edward Lear's name so well known—far more so than his landscapes, whatever their merit. Many additions have been made to the present series, and these are not less laughable (if one is in the mood) than their predecessors; still we may hint that it is just possible to "harp too much on one string."

Mr. Francis Savage Reilly, of Lincoln's Inn, has been appointed one of her Majesty's counsel learned in the law.

THE PAINS OF MEMORY.

In spite of Rogers and of poets greater than he, there are few thoughtful men who will not sometimes feel conscious that the pains of memory are greater than its pleasures. Looking back is, in certain moods, so painful that a man is afraid to glance over the dead years, to recall the hopes that have been blighted, the morning aspirations that have died in the garish light of day, the noble purpose that has never been fulfilled, or the ignoble purpose gained only to yield bitter fruit and permanent regret. In proportion to the sensitiveness of a man's nature is this vivid consciousness of failure. Coleridge, not without a cause, carried this burden of sorrow with him through life; and Hartley Coleridge, with the same infirmity of purpose that thwarted his father's marvellous gifts, describes his pains of memory in a sonnet, the full import of which can be understood only by readers of his life. We remember, too, how Charles Lamb's fine countenance was marked by the sadness "waiting on fruitless thoughts and baffled aspirations;" and how, after the suicide of the wife he had deserted, Shelley was "haunted by recollections which pursued him like an Orestes." There are dull people, no doubt, who feel nothing strongly. They are content with the present as they have been content with the past. They have the convenient art of forgetting everything that is apt to leave a mark upon more susceptible natures. They have done or said foolish things without being conscious of the folly; they have missed golden opportunities—lost, perhaps, the very tide which "taken at the flood leads on to fortune;" or, worse still, have missed a friendship that would have warmed their cold lives with the heat of summer, and yet have no perception of their irreparable loss. The smallest everyday annoyance—a badly-cooked dinner or a tradesman's overcharge—would trouble such dead-alive folk more than the most painful incident of the past.

Looking back, indeed, may be, and often is, an act of folly. A man does but lessen his present strength by moaning over the faults and blunders of earlier years. It is well that the dead past should "bury its dead." And yet it is not always well, since we can gain little for the present and the future if we utterly ignore the past. For many of us, at least, it is inevitable that the ghostlike images of dead hours should haunt our vision by day, and stand at night beside our pillow. At such moments we see with a vividness well-nigh startling what we might have done with our lives and what we have done with them; and few earnest men can see this without some pang of memory. We are not alluding here to the recollections of persons who have fallen into some grievous fault, who see no escape from its consequences, and are yet keenly sensitive of the fall. Who can doubt that there are men and women living on this earth whose memory must ever bring with it thoughts of keenest anguish? Heaven help them! The light pen of the journalist cannot appropriately touch on sorrows like these. The pains of memory, however, may be felt sharply enough by persons whose lives have been comparatively smooth and uneventful. Sitting by the fire in the evening twilight, a man remembers, perhaps, with keen pleasure that his life has been what is commonly called a successful one. He has risen to wealth and position; he has gained a reputation in science, in art, or in literature. His book has won golden opinions; his pictures are praised by great artists, and are not rejected at the Academy; he has made an important scientific discovery, and may be even able to affirm that the comfortable world in which he has achieved his greatness will, before many years are past, disappear from its place in the heavens. In short, he has worked his way up to fame and fortune, and the memory brings with it a sense of satisfaction.

But such recollections are rarely without alloy. His course may not have been as straightforward as it is brilliant; he may be conscious he is not all the world thinks him, and that there are weak points in his armour which even his best friends may discover some day. The pleasures of memory will not be wholly pleasurable if the recollection of outward success blends with the suspicion, if not with the distinct consciousness, of moral failure; if the man feel that he has lived for selfish ends, and that, while gaining the good things of life, he has not won love. For the happiest memories, however blent with sorrow they may be, are those in which affection and self-forgetfulness have a part. As Jeanie Deans said, it is not what we have done for ourselves, but what we have done for others, that we think of most pleasantly.

Then, too, there is a pain of memory from which none of us can escape, and it is one which men whose lives have been most successful feel the most bitterly. It is the remembrance of the losses that time inevitably brings with it. Fame and wealth, or the high honour which a good man values more than either, are gifts rarely bestowed upon the young. They come to us, if they come at all, when the dear ones who cheered us in defeat and stimulated to fresh efforts are unable to participate in our triumph. "How happy this day might have been," we say, and the thought of what might have been is one of the sharpest pains of memory. What was her splendid burst of triumph to Charlotte Brontë when her sisters were no longer able to share it? What was the applause of listening senators to Burke after the grave had closed upon his only son? There are moments when all the beauty of earth and sky—the joyous awakening of spring, the serene loveliness of summer, the song of birds or of mountain streams, the scent of flowers, the breath of the west wind—do but serve to bring back a memory which, if not wholly painful, makes us cry out "for the touch of a vanished hand and the sound of a voice that is still."

Another pain that affects most of us when life, as we are viewing it, becomes more full of memories than of hopes, is the growing sense of physical, if not of mental, incapacity. A man who has reached middle-age, or passed it, rarely feels his life in every limb. Rather is he inclined to exclaim with Coleridge—

When I was young—ah! woeful when.
Ah! for the change 'twixt now and then.
Nought cared this body for wind or weather
When youth and I lived in it together.

And the contrast between the past and present cannot be always felt without a pang.

Life, said Pope, when the first heats are over, is all downhill; but it does not follow that the journey must be made without the refreshment of quiet resting-places, soothing hopes, and tender memories. The beauty of a long summer day is often felt most keenly at sunset. We have, indeed, dwelt long enough on the pains of memory; they are real, they are sometimes intense, but a healthy nature will not be permanently depressed by them.

After all, Samuel Rogers is right. We have but dwelt on the dark side of a subject the brightness of which is more permanent and more worthy of a poet's song. But in order that looking back upon the days that are no more may become a solid source of delight, the pleasure must be due to an interior peace invincible to the strokes of fortune. Happy the man whose conscience is his strong retreat, and who is—

Lord of himself though not of lands,
And having nothing yet hath all.

THE EASTER VOLUNTEER REVIEW.

The general orders and distribution of the forces to be assembled at Portsmouth on Easter Monday, under the command of General His Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, C.B., commanding the southern district, have been issued from the War Office by Sir Charles Ellice, Adjutant-General of the Forces.

According to the distribution, the eastern, or attacking force, under the command of Major-General Higginson, C.B., will number upwards of 15,000 Volunteers, besides a field battery of Royal Artillery. It will be divided into two divisions, commanded by Major-Generals Newdigate, C.B., and Sir Evelyn Wood, V.C., K.C.B., each of three brigades and a divisional battalion attached to each, the commands of which will be given, except in two cases, to officers of the Army commanding regimental districts. The exceptions are Viscount Ranelagh, K.C.B., and Viscount Bury, K.C.M.G., both volunteer officers. The attacking force will also have two brigades of Volunteer Artillery, the 1st Sussex and 3rd Middlesex, with twenty guns—eight 40-pounder breechloaders and twelve 20-pounders—under Lieutenant-Colonel F. G. Baylay, R.A.

The western, or defending, force, will be commanded by Major-General T. H. Pakenham, and besides a brigade of Volunteer Artillery, that of Woolwich Arsenal, under Lieutenant-Colonel Hozier, with eight 40-pounder breechloaders, will comprise one division only of volunteers, formed into three brigades and a divisional battalion, 8729 of the two arms of artillery and infantry. This division will be commanded by Major-General the Hon. E. Gage, C.B., and there will be attached to it a field battery and a detachment of the Royal Artillery, the latter with eight 64-pounder guns, nearly 800 of the Royal Marine Artillery, a battalion of Royal Marines, and four battalions of territorial regiments of the Line.

The total force to take part in the operations will thus be nearly 28,000 of all arms, the cavalry being represented by the very small contingent of thirty-eight sabres of a troop of the local yeomanry. The following is a complete list of all the troops which are to be assembled, with the officers of the General Staff; also those belonging, respectively, to the staff of Major-General Higginson and to that of Major-General Pakenham; and those of the divisional and brigade commands:—

To Command.—General Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, C.B., commanding the Troops, Southern District. Aides-de-Camp—Captain Lord A. Seymour, Scots Guards, and Major the Hon. C. C. G. REGULAR FORCES.

One field battery Royal Artillery (Fareham). Brigade Major, 1st Brigade.—Colonel Mawbey, R.M.A., commanding. Brigade Major, Major Ogilby, R.M.A. Aides-de-Camp, Major Kelly and Major Owen, R.M.A. Corps:—Royal Marine Artillery, 779; 1st Battalion Leicestershire Regiment, 325; 2nd Battalion Gordon Highlanders, 425; detachment of Royal Artillery with eight 64-pounder guns, and F troop Hampshire Yeomanry, 88 (Hilsea Lines).

2nd Brigade.—Colonel Hodge, 2nd Battalion Berkshire Regiment, commanding. Brigade Major, Captain Harris; and Aide-de-Camp, Captain Pigott. Corps:—2nd Battalion Berkshire Regiment, 378; 2nd Battalion Royal Highlanders, 324; and Royal Marine Light Infantry, 489 (Fareham).

The general idea is that an invading force, having effected a landing near Brighton, marches on London, and detaches a force to mask Portsmouth, which is weakly garrisoned. A force from Aldershot is dispatched to reinforce the garrison, and arrives at Fareham at the same time as the enemy occupies Havant. The commanders of both forces, considering the advantages equal, determine to attack each other, for the purpose of obtaining possession of the Portsdown Heights. The works on Portsdown Hill are supposed to be non-existent. The general instructions state that the enemy is represented by the 1st and 2nd Divisions of Volunteer Corps, about 15,000 strong, with one field battery Royal Artillery. The force from Aldershot is represented by the 3rd Volunteer Division. Of the Portsmouth garrison, one infantry brigade, with a field battery of Royal Artillery, joins the Aldershot force at Fareham, while another brigade occupies the Hilsea Lines. A few gun-boats and launches are pushed as far as possible up the harbour to assist the defence by their fire, while a small force of blue-jackets lands and holds Porchester. The attacking force of the enemy will have to seize and hold Cosham, and protect its left flank, with a sufficient force, from an attack by the Portsmouth garrison; and, in marching towards Fareham, it will have to move along the northern crest and slope of the Portsdown Hill, in order to protect itself from the fire of the gun-boats and of the heavy guns within the Hilsea Lines. Neither of the opposing forces will advance beyond Fort Nelson, on the one side, and Forts Purbrook and Furlington, on the other, which will be the rendezvous of the respective forces before the signal-gun fires for the commencement of the operations, at twelve o'clock.

At the conclusion of the manoeuvres, the whole of the forces will assemble on the heights half-way between Forts Widley and Southwick. It has been decided by the Easter Monday Review Committee to increase to £475 the prize-money to be competed for. The Commander of the Military District, Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, has arranged a German tattoo on Southsea Common after the review, in which all the bands in garrison will take part.

It is not a little remarkable that, although the review of 1863 was the most successful which the Volunteers had had up to that date, Portsmouth was not again selected as the site of this annual display until the present year. This particular result cannot fairly be charged to any apathy on the part of the inhabitants or the local authorities. Again and again have efforts been made to induce the metropolitan commanding officers to abandon their apparent preference for Brighton, but some difficulty or other has always barred the way. The mere fact of the much greater distance by rail of our chief naval arsenal, coupled, perhaps, with a certain reluctance on the part of the railway companies to provide the extra accommodation, would alone help to explain the long interval between the first and the second Portsmouth review, if it did not entirely justify it. However that may be, there is no question that this year all the authorities concerned in the affair have worked with the greatest cordiality, and even enthusiasm; and so much care and foresight have been displayed that it is perfectly safe to predict a still larger measure of success for next week's Review than that which marked the similar event fourteen years ago.

Special advantages prompted the choice of Portsmouth in 1868. The circumstance that it was a large garrison town, with an imposing circle of forts, was too obvious to be overlooked, and so then, as now, the military authorities consented to the co-operation of the regular troops with the Volunteers. The former numbered about 1900, including infantry and marine artillery, and the Volunteers about 28,000, the total strength, according to the official returns, being 29,972 men of all arms. In point of numbers then, the Review of 1868 was on a par with that of the present year, although, in other respects, the latter is destined to be by far the more important event. In 1868, the march-past on Southsea Common preceded the sham-fight at Hilsea, and only some sixteen thousand Volunteers and 1900 regulars took part in it. The attempt to squeeze the two events into one day's programme also led to a certain degree of confusion, and this is no doubt the reason why the march-past on Southsea Common is to be omitted from next Monday's programme. This will naturally be a disappointment to many of the inhabitants and not a few of the numerous visitors who will throng the town; but in other respects the change will be of great advantage. It will permit of the general idea of a mimic battle being completely carried out, and if any hitch does occur in the programme it will presumably be possible to fix the responsibility of this on the defaulting part of its performance in the field.

OLD UNIVERSITY CUSTOMS.

Few historical documents are of more value than those which relate to our Universities, inasmuch as they record the early life of men who have made themselves illustrious for all time. It is interesting, also, to note how many of the social habits and manners of our University system which prevailed in days long ago gone by are still kept up; as, too, are numerous of those old-established customs to which so much importance was formerly attached. Thus, the oldest member of the University may hear, as often as he visits Oxford, the familiar note of Great Tom, which every evening at ten minutes past nine tolls 101 times when the gates of the colleges and halls are shut. Indeed, it has often been remarked that our University life alters so little in the course of years that it would be difficult for anyone, however long he may have been absent from the scene of his University career, to discover much alteration in the usages associated with it. Some of the old customs have naturally, in the lapse of years, become modified, whereas others have ceased to exist. Amongst, then, some of the most curious observed at different times at Oxford may be mentioned one alluded to by Pointer, in his "Oxonien Academia" (1749-71), who says that at Brasenose College the members went "in a body on New-Year's Day to their Principal, each presenting him with an epistle by way of a New-Year's gift, wishing him a happy New Year." The same writer speaks of a custom observed at Queen's College, for the members "to give a needle and thread to the Fellows," a rebus on their founder's name, Eglesfield.

The "Festival of the Mallard" was formerly kept up at All Souls' College in commemoration of the discovery of a very large mallard in a drain, when digging for the foundation of the college. Though the observance no longer exists, yet on one of the college "gaudies" there is sung an old song known as "The Merry Old Song of the All Souls' Mallard;" the first stanza of which is as follows:—

Griffin, bustard, turkey, capon,
Let other hungry mortals gaze on;
And on the bones their stomach fall hard,
But let All Souls' men have their mallard.
Oh! by the blood of King Edward,
Oh! by the blood of King Edward,
It was a strapping mallard.

The allusion to King Edward seems to be an anachronism, as King Henry VI. was reigning at the time of the foundation of the college.

Another odd ceremony, which has been long practised on Easter Day at University College, is called "chopping at the tree." The representation of a tree, dressed with evergreens and flowers, is placed on a turf close to the buttery, at which every member of the college, as he leaves the hall after dinner, chops with a cleaver. The cook and his attendant, dressed in white jackets, take their stand on either side of the block, each bearing a pewter dish, one supporting a blunt chopping axe from the kitchen, the other in readiness for the fees expected on the occasion—the Master depositing half a guinea, each Fellow five shillings and sixpence. According to the tradition current amongst the undergraduates, anyone who can chop the block in two—under the circumstances, a physical impossibility—can lay claim to all the college estates; a notion, however, which has not met with the sanction of the Master and Fellows.

Then there is the well-known observance at Magdalen College of May morning, when the choristers, accompanied by members of that and different colleges, ascend to the platform of the tower at about half-past four o'clock in the morning, and as soon as Magdalen bell has struck five sing a Latin hymn. A description of this custom was contributed to these columns on May 17, 1856, by Dr. Rimbault. Another custom connected with Magdalen College was formerly kept up on St. John's Day, an interesting account of which occurs in the "Life of Bishop Horne," by the Rev. W. Jones (xii. 131):—"A letter of July 25, 1755, informed me that Mr. Horne, according to an established custom at Magdalen College, Oxford, had begun to preach before the University on the day of St. John the Baptist. For the preaching of this annual sermon, a permanent pulpit of stone is inserted into a corner of the first quadrangle; and so long as the stone pulpit was in use, the quadrangle was furnished round the sides with a large fence of green boughs, that the preaching might more resemble that of John the Baptist in the Wilderness."

Amongst other customs may be mentioned one on St. David's Day at Jesus College, it having been the practice to fill an immense silver-gilt bowl, containing ten gallons, with "Swig," and to hand it round to those invited to dine on the occasion. Pointer further tells us that at Brasenose College "the scholars had almonds, raisins, and figs for dinner on Good Friday, as appears by a receipt of thirty shillings, paid by the butler of the college, for 'Eleven pounds of almonds, thirty-five pounds of raisins, and thirteen pounds of figs, servid into Bruzenose College, March 28, 1662.'"

The time-honoured custom of serving up the boar's head at Queen's College on Christmas Day has not lost any of its popularity; having originated, runs the University tradition, in the following circumstance:—"A student of the college whilst walking in the neighbouring forest of Shotover studying Aristotle was suddenly attacked by a wild boar. The furious beast came open mouthed upon him; but he, with a lucky presence of mind, rammed the volume down its throat, and, crying Grecum est, choked it."

In years gone by, both the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge had their Lords of Misrule, one of the Masters of Arts being chosen to undertake this important office. Thus, in an audit-book of Trinity College for the year 1559 occurs a disbursement, "pro praudio Principis Natalicii." Wood, in his "Athenæ Oxonienses," alludes to the Christmas Prince at St. John's and Merton Colleges. Again, in the hall of Merton College, previously to the Reformation, the Fellows were accustomed to assemble round the fire, for the purpose of singing hymns and carols on holyday evenings and their vigils, from the Vigil of All Saints to the evening of the Purification; a custom which was abolished at the Reformation. Pointer, too, mentions a custom once kept up at Merton for the college servants on the last night of the year, called "Scrutiny Night," to make their appearance in the hall before the Warden and Fellows, and there to deliver up the keys, so that, if they had committed any offence during the year, their keys might be taken from them.

At Christ Church, when the Dean and Chapter dine in hall, a single verse is recited in Greek from the first chapter of St. John's Gospel, and then the Dean interposes, saying "Tu Autem." The old term Taberdar, which, in former years, was applied to a scholar of Queen's College on the foundation—a term corresponding with the Demy of Magdalen or the Postmaster of Merton—was said to have originated from the scholars having worn a short surplice at the chapel service resembling in its brevity the tabard of the herald. Lastly, Southey, in his "Common-Place Book" (1851, 4th S., 425), referring to All Souls' College, says that "their silver cups are called ox-eyes, and an ox-eye of wormwood was a favourite draught there. Beer with an infusion of wormwood was to be had nowhere else."

SOUTHWICK FORT.

HILSEA LINES, FROM POST B

PLAN OF THE BATTLE OF PORTSMOUTH.

The "general idea" of the battle to take place on Easter Monday at Portsmouth, which has been set forth by the Quartermaster-General's Department, is this—a large invading force is supposed to have landed on the south coast near Brighton for the purpose of attacking London. With the object of providing against a rear attack, the commander detaches a division of 15,000 strong, being equal in numbers to two thirds of the entire Volunteer force under arms, to Portsmouth, with instructions to mask the garrison and prevent the army getting out. This division will represent the enemy in the day's operations. Hearing of this movement, the General in command at Aldershot pushes forward an army 7000 strong, for the purpose of relieving the Portsmouth garrison; and so accurately are the movements timed that, just as the enemy's forces are deposited at Havant, the relieving army is to arrive at Fareham, on the western boundary of the field. Simultaneously with these movements, the Regular Forces at Portsmouth take possession of the Hilsea lines, which protect the town at the rear, and the Marines join the army at Fareham. These compose the army of the defenders. The ground is open, and there are practically no restrictions; the rival Generals will have an opportunity of displaying considerable tactical skill. The only conditions which will be imposed upon them are that the railway will have to be respected, and that they shall not advance beyond Fort Purbrook to the east, and Fort Nelson to the west, of the range, before the firing of the signal to begin the fight. The distance intervening between the fronts will be about five miles. The forts on the crest of the hill will be supposed to be non-existing.

The conflict is to commence with an affair of outposts, the garrison having sent a party to hold Cosham, but not in force; and the enemy having driven these in, and finding himself about equal in numbers to the force arrayed against him, risks a general engagement. The critical part of the battle will most probably take place near the beginning, when the enemy endeavours to blockade the garrison forces within the Hilsca lines. These lines are at present unarmed, so that it will be only possible to mount comparatively light guns upon the parapets. On the other hand, the enemy is known to have twenty 40-pounder guns of position, with which he will be able to sweep the glacis of the hill and upper reaches of the harbour. There is only a single means of exit from the lines across the Port bridge, so that the garrison troops will be placed at great disadvantage at the beginning. If the General in command be clever and audacious, he may attempt to cut a way through the earth-works and cross the creek upon pontoons. A complete enumeration of the forces to be assembled will be found on another page.

PREPARATIONS FOR THE RECEPTION OF THE PRINCE OF WALES AT PORTSMOUTH.

The street decorations at Portsmouth and Gosport are on a rather extensive scale. The Prince of Wales, on arriving at Portsmouth on Saturday afternoon, will, when opposite the Masonic Club, pass under an archway, which, in honour of his position as Grand Master of the Order, will be embellished with coloured devices relating to the Craft. A short distance from the residence of Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, with whom the Prince will stay during his visit to Portsmouth, there will be another arch. Both are erected under the direction of Mr. George Rake, C.E. It is not yet known whether the Prince of Wales will arrive at Portsmouth in time to witness any performances at the Navy, Army, and Volunteer Athletic Meeting, which is to take place on Saturday afternoon; but H.R.H. will be present at the Minnesingers' Smoking Concert on the Saturday night. On the evening of the review there will be a grand military tattoo on Southsea Common by all the military bands in Portsmouth garrison, at which the Prince of Wales, after dining with Prince Edward, will be present.

OBITUARY.

LORD ERSKINE.

The Right Hon. John Cadwallader Erskine, Baron Erskine, of Restormel Castle, in the county of Cornwall, died at Ettenheim House, Torquay, on the 28th ult. He was born in 1804, the second son of David Montagu, second Baron Erskine, by Fanny, his first wife, daughter of General John Cadwalader of Philadelphia, and at his elder brother's death, May 10, 1877, succeeded to the peerage, conferred in 1806 on his grandfather, the Hon. Thomas Erskine, the eloquent advocate, on his advancement to be Lord Chancellor. The nobleman whose decease we record received his education at Haileybury, and served in the Bengal Civil Service from 1826 to 1853. He married, first, April 30, 1829, Margaret, youngest daughter of Mr. John Martyn, of the county of Tyrone, which lady died June 21, 1862; and secondly, Jan. 25, 1865, Mary Louisa Cullen, eldest daughter of Colonel Alexander Campbell, C.B., K.H., of Blackburn House, Ayrshire. By his first wife he had two daughters and one son, William Macnaghten, late Captain 9th Lancers, now fifth Lord Erskine, who was born in 1841, and married, in 1864, Caroline Alice Martha, daughter of Mr. William Grumble, by whom he has issue.

COLONEL LOCKHART.

Colonel Laurence William Maxwell Lockhart died at Mentone on the 23rd ult. He was second son of the Rev. Lawrence Lockhart, D.D., of Wicketshaw and Milton Lockhart, in the county of Lanark, Incumbent of Inchinnan, in the county of Renfrew, by Louisa, his wife, daughter of Mr. David Blair, and was descended of a very ancient Lanarkshire family. His uncle, Dr. John Gibson Lockhart, was son-in-law of Sir Walter Scott. Colonel Lockhart was formerly in the 92nd Highlanders, with which he served at Sebastopol. He was well known as a popular novelist, and a contributor to Blackwood's Magazine. During the Franco-Prussian War he acted as correspondent to the Times. The Colonel married, in 1860, Katharine, younger daughter of Sir James Russell, K.C.B., of Ashestiel, in the county of Selkirk, and leaves issue.

We have also to record the deaths of—

Major-General Sir Robert Laffan, R.E., K.C.M.G., Governor of the Bermudas, on the 22nd ult., at Bermuda.

Miss Dora Greenwell, on the 29th ult., at Clifton. Miss Greenwell will be remembered as one of the earliest writers in Good Words and Sunday Magazine. Many of her prose works have had a deserved reputation. She had long been an invalid.

The Rev. Thomas Houston, D.D., Professor of Exegetical and Pastoral History and of Ecclesiastical History in the Reformed Presbyterian Church, Ireland, on the 27th ult., in Belfast.

Mr. Joseph Manning, J.P., an Alderman of Dublin, and a highly respected citizen, on the 30th ult., in his sixty-first year. It is stated that he declined more than once to be Lord Mayor of Dublin.

Colonel William Acland Douglas Anderson, C.M.G., in South Yarra, in Victoria, on Jan. 23. Colonel Anderson in 1855 raised in Melbourne the first volunteer corps which had been organised in Australia, and in 1862 he was appointed Colonel Commandant of all the Victoria Volunteer forces.

Professor Thomas Hill Green, of Oxford. He obtained a first class in classics in 1859, was elected Fellow of Balliol in 1860, and obtained the English Essay prize in 1862. After being some time a Tutor of Balliol, he was elected Professor of Moral Philosophy, on which subject he wrote largely.

Mr. William Menelaus, manager of the extensive iron and steel works at Dowlais, at Tenby, on the 30th ult., in the sixty-fifth year of his age. He had been suffering for some considerable time, and last week was seized with paralysis, which terminated fatally. One of his last public acts was to present to the Cardiff Free Library a magnificent collection of pictures, estimated to be worth £10,000. He had introduced and carried out many improvements in the manufacture of iron and steel, and was highly esteemed throughout England and Wales.

Mr. John Maunsell, of Oakly Park, in the county of Kildare, and of Carrickoreilly, in the county of Limerick, J.P., High Sheriff of the county of Kildare, 1868, on the 29th ult. He was born November, 1810, the eldest son of Mr. Richard Maunsell, of Oakly Park, J.P., High Sheriff, 1841, by Maria, his wife, sister of George Woods, Esq., of Milverton Hall, in the county of Dublin. By his death (unmarried) the estates and representation of this branch of the family of Maunsell of Ballywilliam devolve on his brother, Mr. George Woods Maunsell, of Merrion-square, Dublin, J.P. and D.L.

The anniversary meeting of the Chemical Society was held on Thursday week at Burlington House. The president, Professor Roscoe, F.R.S., gave his annual address, and congratulated the Fellows on the satisfactory condition of the society, both numerically and financially. There are 1175 Fellows now enrolled on the register. Dr. Gilbert, F.R.S., was elected president for the ensuing year.

According to the revenue returns which were issued yesterday week, the national receipts into the Exchequer during the quarter were £27,009,227, a net decrease of £859,897 as compared with the first three months of last year. The return for the financial year, which ended yesterday week, shows a total revenue of £85,822,282, as compared with £84,041,288 in the year ending March 31, 1881, showing a net increase of £1,780,994. The principal increases were £1,940,000 in the Excise, £320,000 from Stamps, and £300,000 from the Post Office. The chief decrease was £705,000 from the Property and Income Tax.

A number of gentlemen went to the Victoria Docks last week to visit the cold storage chambers which have been recently erected by the London and St. Katharine's Docks Company—the first on this side to recognise the importance of making suitable arrangements for receiving the frozen meat from Australia and storing it until required for the market. Amongst those present were Mr. Thomas Archer, Agent-General for Queensland; Sir F. Dillon Bell, Agent-General for New Zealand; Sir Alexander Galt, High Commissioner for Canada; Sir Daniel Cooper, and many others interested in the frozen-meat trades. The machinery for producing the cold in the chambers—which are kept considerably below freezing-point—has been supplied by Messrs. J. and E. Hall, of Dartford, who have also supplied many machines to the companies in Australia for freezing the meat in the first instance. At the time of the visit some 1700 carcasses were being taken in, and several of them were divested of the bags which covered them—the appearance of the meat being very much admired.

The tenth annual chess-match between the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge was played on the 30th ultimo, and resulted in a victory for Cambridge with a score of five games to three and five draws. The first of these matches was played in 1873, and in that and the following five years they were of the runaway kind, each University scoring, in turn, by large margins. In 1879 the play on both sides showed a marked improvement of force and style; but in 1880 Oxford came out of the encounter without scoring a solitary point. Last year the contest was a close one (Cambridge 5, Oxford 4), and this year Cambridge is again successful, as noted above. The following table shows the pairing of the players and their respective scores, the drawn games counting half a point to each side:—

CAMBRIDGE.				OXFORD.

The return match between the Oxford University club and the fourth class of the City club, to which we referred last week, but the result of which our early publication was rendered uncertain, was played, as announced, on the 28th ult., at the Lord Raglan Hotel, St. Martin's-le-Grand. Both parties to the contest were well represented, each bringing thirteen competitors into the field. At the call of time it was found that each side had scored ten, and that one game remained unfinished. This, after due examination, was awarded by Mr. Macdonnell, the umpire, to Oxford, who thus scored the victory by one game. One of the games played on this occasion appears above.

The North London club played its last match of the season on the 30th ult., when it was opposed by the Alexandra. North London won with a score of seven games to two. Of the thirteen matches in which this club has engaged since the opening of the season in October last, its champions have won nine, lost three, and drawn one. A highly creditable record.

Lancashire has issued a circular letter containing the correspondence between the representatives of that county and those of Yorkshire, preliminary to the failure of negotiations which we announced last week. The correspondence adds nothing to the facts already known. Yorkshire wants at least seventy-five adversaries, and Lancashire could, or would, not undertake to enlist more than fifty. Yorkshire is a large county; it is a tradition of our boyish days that it contains more acres (and there may be more chess-players there also) than there are words in the Bible. Nevertheless it ought to be able to display a fair average of its chess force within the limit of half a hundred, suggested by Lancashire. It is right that each side should be jealous of the honour of its county; but let us hope, play or no play, that this modern "War of the Roses" will not be allowed to descend to a newspaper controversy.

On the 25th ult. a match was played between the Greenwich and Bermondsey Clubs, in which the former gained the victory by 4½ to 3½.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated Nov. 15, 1879) of the Rev. Horace Robert Pechell, late of Moorlands Bitterne, in the county of Southampton, who died on Feb. 22 last, was proved on the 23rd ult. by Augustus Pechell, Mark Robert Pechell, and Hervey Charles Pechell, the sons, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £115,000. The only persons interested under the will are testator's said sons and his daughter, Mrs. Horatia Charlotte Skipwith.

The will (dated April 12, 1881) of the Right Hon. Sir Richard Malins, P.C., formerly Senior Vice-Chancellor of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, late of Canon Hill, Maidenhead, Berks, and of No. 57, Lowndes-square, who died on Jan. 15 last, was proved on the 18th ult. by Peter Williams, one of the surviving executors, the value of the personal estate being over £95,000. There are numerous legacies and annuities, including £30,000, upon trust, for his niece and adopted daughter, Miss Emily Rose Cary, and £500 per annum, or such larger sum as will make up her annual income to £2000, until marriage; annuities of £300 each to his sister, Miss Malins, and his niece, Mrs. Edith Hudson; such sum as will produce £300 per annum, upon trust, for his great-niece, Mrs. Florence Susan Harrison, her husband, and children; and such sum as will produce £500 per annum upon trust for his nephew, Richard Arthur Cary, his wife, and children. As to the residue of his property, the testator gives one half to his said niece, Miss Cary, and the other half to his nephew, the said Richard Arthur Cary. The provision made for his wife of course fails by her death in testator's lifetime.

The will (dated July 21, 1876) of Mr. Thomas Holway Perks, late of Pebble Combe, Surrey, who died on Feb. 11 last, was proved on the 16th ult. by William Perks, Edmund Perks, and William Perks, the nephews, the executors, the personal estate amounting to over £63,000. The testator leaves to his wife £300, his household furniture, effects, horses and carriages, and an annuity of £500, to be reduced to £250 per annum in the event of her marrying again; to his brothers, John Brownjohn Perks and William Wercat Perks, and to Mrs. Ann Perks, the wife of his last-named brother, £2000 each; and the residue of his real and personal estate to the children of his said brothers, in equal shares.

The will (dated March 2, 1880) of Mr. George Edmund Street, R.A., late of No. 14, Cavendish-place, and of Holmdale, Surrey, who died on Dec. 18 last, was proved on the 23rd ult. by Arthur Edmund Street, the son, the executor, the value of the personal estate exceeding £55,000. The testator devises and bequeaths all his real and personal estate to his said son.

The will (dated Jan. 27, 1875), with a codicil (dated June 20, 1879), of Mr. Robert Laurie, Clarenceux King of Arms, late of the College of Arms, Queen Victoria-street, and of Wentworth House, Richmond, who died on Jan. 13 last, was proved on the 14th ult. by William Charles Laurie, and the Rev. Titus Edward Laurie, the nephews, the executors, the value of the personal estate being over £42,000. The testator confirms the settlement made on his wife, Mrs. Julia Laurie, and makes bequests to his brothers, sister, nephews, nieces, and others. The residue of his property, real and personal, he leaves to his nephews and niece, William Charles Laurie, the Rev. Titus Edward Laurie, George Naylor Woods Laurie, Charles Frederick Laurie, Henry Alfred Laurie, and Mrs. Julia Lawton, and to the two children of his nephew, Henry Frewen Laurie, by his first wife.

The will (dated July 31, 1878) of Sir William Henry Drake, K.C.B., late of No. 10, Clanricarde-gardens, who died on Jan. 28 last, was proved on the 4th ult. by Dame Elizabeth Lucy Drake, the widow and sole executrix, to whom he gives all his estate and effects, real and personal, for her own use and benefit. The personal estate amounts to over £27,000.

The will (dated July 15, 1872), with four codicils (dated July 29, 1874; Dec. 29 and 30, 1880; and Feb. 2, 1881), of Dame Augusta Anne Barron, late of No. 2, Halkin-street, Grosvenor-place, who died on Dec. 27 last, was proved on the 9th ult. by Henry William Forester, the sole executor, the value of the personal estate amounting to nearly £24,000. The testatrix leaves a large number of legacies, both pecuniary and specific, to relatives, friends, and servants, and the residue of her property to Miss Emma Mostyn Owen. The deceased was the widow of Sir Henry Winston Barron, Bart., and daughter of General Lord Charles Somerset, second son of Henry, fifth Duke of Beaufort.

The will (dated July 3, 1880) of the Hon. James Kenneth Howard, J.P., D.L., one of the Commissioners of her Majesty's Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, late of Hazely, near Newbury, Berks, who died on Jan. 7 last, was proved on the 2nd ult. by Lady Louisa Howard, the widow and acting executrix, the value of the personal estate exceeding £9000. The testator leaves all his real estate at or near Hazely upon the trusts of his marriage settlement; his furniture and effects to trustees; and the residue of his real and personal estate to his wife. The deceased was the youngest son of Thomas, sixteenth Earl of Suffolk and Berkshire, and was M.P. for Malmesbury from 1841 to 1852.

The will (dated Feb. 21, 1880), with a codicil (dated Feb. 23 following), of Mr. William Harrison Ainsworth, late of St. Mary's-road, Reigate, who died on Jan. 3 last, was proved on the 24th ult. by Charles Heaton Hinde, the acting executor, the personal estate exceeding £4000. The testator leaves certain furniture and effects at Hurstpierpoint to his daughter Fauny for life, then to his daughter Mrs. Ann Blanche Swainson for life, and afterwards to her three children, and he makes no further provision for his said daughters and his daughter Emily Mary, having already made ample provision for them by settlement; to his executor, twenty guineas; and the household furniture, &c., at his residence, to his wife, Mrs. Sarah Ainsworth. The residue of his real and personal estate is to be held upon trust for his wife for life, and then for his daughter Clara.

Cyprus has got a new Constitution. The Legislative Council will consist of eighteen members—six official, nine Christian, and three Mohammedan. The Turkish inhabitants have protested to the Porte against the new Constitution.

Mr. Giffen has presented to the Board of Trade a report on the emigration from the United Kingdom in the year 1881, together with a comparative statement referring to a series of past years. The total number of emigrants last year was 392,514, of which 243,002 were British and Irish, showing an increase under the last head of 15,460. Within the past six years the smallest exodus of British subjects was in 1877, when it numbered 31,305. In 1879 it was more than double the return of the previous year, owing to the deficient harvest and the badness of trade. Omitting Sundays, and making allowance for immigration, emigrants leave our shores at the rate of 1000 a day. With regard to Irish emigration, the increase in which was a noticeable feature of last year's report, there has been a great falling off as compared with the numbers of 1880. The numbers in 1880 were 93,641, and last year they were 76,200.

LONDON: SATURDAY, APRIL 15, 1882.

Our national holidays—those at least that occur in spring and summer—are year by year assuming more gigantic proportions as the public taste improves and locomotive facilities increase. Probably the Easter festival has, in this sense, never been so well kept as during this week. As a rule at this vernal season, we expect unsettled, if not absolutely disagreeable, weather. This year the conditions of outdoor existence have, from the first, been favourable. The mild winter, the paucity of moisture, and the preponderance of sunshine have been exceptionally favourable to agricultural operations. Our farmers, if they cannot afford to “rest,” have every reason to be “thankful.” So also with holiday-makers, who have enjoyed one of the brightest Easters on record. Cloudless skies and brilliant sunshine have mitigated, if not wholly neutralised, the effect of the chilling easterly winds that are characteristic of the season. On no previous occasion at this period have places of public resort been so thronged, as for instance, at Hampstead Heath, where the visitors on Easter Monday numbered more than 100,000; and the railways have rarely carried greater crowds into the charming rural districts around the metropolis, where, perhaps for the first time this year, the majority have seen Nature arrayed in her newest and loveliest attire.

To our gallant Volunteers the Bank Holiday, though not without its pleasurable excitements, was a day of hard work; and it speaks well for their sense of duty and esprit de corps that as many as 20,000 gathered together, of their own free will, in the neighbourhood of Portsmouth to take part in the arduous labours of mimic warfare, as well as to assist in the customary and more perfunctory march-past. The manoeuvres of the day, in which a body of regular troops with heavy artillery as well as some gun-boats, took part, were a real lesson in military science. The conflict between the invaders and defenders of the Hilsa Lines was preceded by a march in military order from the village of Petersfield to Portsdown, where our citizen soldiers concentrated, the effectiveness of which elicited the marked approbation of the Duke of Cambridge, who witnessed the operations. From about noon till two in the afternoon the conflict between the two forces, under Generals Higginson and Pakenham respectively, raged with varying success, and is said to have given to thousands of spectators a fair idea of the excitement and complications of actual war, and the men engaged in these manoeuvres were no doubt encouraged to do their best by the presence of the Prince of Wales, who was at the head of the regiment of which he is the honorary Colonel, and of the veteran Sir Evelyn Wood. Although the umpires were unable to decide which side was victorious when the order "Cease Fire" was sounded, military critics testify that the plan of the battle was well devised; that the troops behaved with steadiness, and showed much spirit and energy; and that "the efficiency of the Volunteers has increased during the last two or three years in a very marked degree." And this is substantially the verdict of the military authorities, as appears from the "general order" of the Commander-in-Chief. While a large portion of the troops were conveyed back to London by rail with admirable precision, those who remained, and the host of civilians who had been attracted to Portsmouth, enjoyed the torchlight tattoo and display of fireworks which closed the varied entertainments of the day. The net result of Monday's manoeuvres is exactly what could be wished—to inspire confidence in the growing efficiency of our Volunteers, who in the aggregate constitute a cheap defensive force of 200,000 men, and thereby to furnish the best antidote to those panics which from time to time "fright the isle from its propriety."

It is a great relief to be spared, even for a few days, the black record of cruel assassinations and outrages, which neither repressive action nor remedial measures have as yet been able to extinguish in Ireland. While most of our Cabinet Ministers are enjoying their well-earned vacation as far as the cares of State will permit, the Irish Chief Secretary cannot afford to indulge with the Home Secretary in excursions to the Land's End, or even in such quiet repose as the Prime Minister is able to secure during this Easter week at Hawarden. Mr. Forster, whose merits as an administrator are being very freely canvassed by the Press, abates not a jot of his arduous duties at Dublin Castle. We would fain hope that his hands will be strengthened by the presence in the Irish metropolis of the Marquis of Hartington and Lord Carlingford, whose visit is said to be connected with some official changes, and the possible resignation of Earl Cowper. But, however that may be, it is not likely that the Chief-Secretary will, however personally disposed, retire from his post of difficulty and danger at this serious crisis, nor that any responsible statesman would be willing to succeed to such an inheritance.

But Ireland has this week supplied a new sensation. Mr. Parnell is not only released, but is now in Paris, whither he has been allowed to proceed for the purpose of being present at the funeral of his favourite nephew. His verbal engagement to refrain, during his parole, from taking part in any political demonstrations, was honourably fulfilled during his short stay in London. In a few days the leader of the Land Leaguers will, no doubt, surrender himself at Kilmainham prison to rejoin his fellow-suspects. The incident has revived anew discussion as to the policy of enforcing the Coercion Acts so far as concerns the temporary incarceration of the authors of the "No-Rent" manifesto. No doubt the Government would be only too glad if there should be so general a cessation of outrages and lawless acts as would justify the absolute release of Mr. Parnell and his colleagues. Unhappily, that time has not yet come. But there is a growing necessity that Ireland should cease to be the battle-ground of political parties, and that Conservatives should unite with Liberals in supporting such well-considered measures as will tend to restore tranquillity on the other side of St. George's Channel. In this sense the proposal of Mr. W. H. Smith to encourage the purchase of their holdings by tenant-farmers is of good omen.

The star of Prince Gortschakoff is sinking below the horizon. His long-expected retirement is now an accomplished fact. Though it is hailed at Berlin as a pacific sign, the Russian Chancellor has long since ceased to take an active part in international questions, and since the Berlin Congress of 1878 he has only nominally represented his country as Minister for Foreign Affairs. Of more practical importance is the formal choice of M. de Giers as his successor. That statesman being of Teutonic extraction, and well known for his pacific tendencies, is in much greater favour at the German and Austrian Courts than the veteran diplomatist who for a quarter of a century guided the external policy of the late Czar, and involved Russia in more than one needless war. The whole tendency of events at the present time is to soften down the evil effects of General Skobelev's incendiary speeches, and to bring about a better understanding between the three Empires of Central Europe. It is the movements of General Ignatieff rather than the actions of M. de Giers that are the source of European anxiety. There is no doubt that, as Minister of the Interior, this Pan Slavist statesman has been a failure; and the recent assassination of General Strelnikoff at Odessa seems to have created the utmost consternation at Gatchina, where the Czar leads a secluded life unworthy of his exalted position. This unexpected revival of Nihilism in its most fanatical forms has revealed a new source of danger to the Imperial dynasty. There are many signs that, to a great extent, a revolutionary spirit pervades some of the most trusted Imperialist regiments. Though still in office, the régime of General Ignatieff is discredited; indeed, his probable successor is already named. The severest repression has failed to stamp out Nihilism; and it seems quite possible that, as a last resource, the bewildered Czar, whose coronation has been indefinitely postponed, will recall to power General Loris Melikoff, the only statesman who has shown adequate capacity to cope with the revolutionary agency that is paralysing the Russian Empire and retarding its free development.

A revolution impends in Egypt; when it will burst forth seems to be only a question of time. The insolent adventurer, Ourabi Pasha, who might have been so easily put down a year ago by the Khedive, and who rose in position because of the lack of courage in official life, now finds that the army, his former tool, has become his master. Numbers of useless officers, following in his footsteps, have exacted promotion—that is, higher pay. The cry is, “still they come;” and Ourabi Pasha is threatened with assassination unless he succumbs. Where is this shameless greed to end? With indolent Colonels fastening on the revenue without service rendered, and Ismail Pasha scattering broadcast among these Pretorians the treasure wrung from the hard-working peasantry, and trying, on frivolous pretences, to obtain the recall of his daughter, with a view to secure his own restoration, the land of the Pharaohs is in a very bad way, if our highway to India is not in jeopardy. Nor does it appear that France and England, separately or conjointly, nor the Great Powers as a final court of appeal, are prepared for so grave an emergency.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

Being rather tired of Things and People in London—the "Season," you will remember, set in with unaccustomed earliness and severity very soon after Christmas—the Distressed Compiler of this page thought there would be no harm, on the Wednesday in Passion Week, in slipping over to Paris for a fortnight. So he is at present a sojourner in Lutetia, and will be most happy to see his numerous acquaintances—including the gentlemen newly enlarged on ticket of leave, who have so much confidential information to impart concerning the Horrors of our Convict Prisons; the authors and authoresses of epic poems, five-act tragedies, and three-volume novels, who call at nine-thirty a.m., and will take no denial; the speculative individuals who are so anxious to obtain the Compiler's adhesion to projects for the supply of the metropolis with Electric Milk, and the purchase, by National Subscription, of an Elephant, three times the size of Jumbo—at his Fairy Home in Paris: the Hôtel Jocrisse, indeed, which is opposite the third newspaper kiosk to the left as you ascend the Rue Tuetête towards the Boulevard Cassemaïjone. It is difficult to be more explicit.

Paris is not by any means a bad place to which to come if you yearn for a few days' absolute peace and quiet. Nothing is so easy as to lie perdu in the gay city—to be the needle with some two millions of Parisians around you forming the pottle of hay. You have but to avoid the quarters where English people most do congregate, and to steer clear of the fashionable cafés and restaurants. If it chances that you do meet anybody you know, make a hideous face and pass on swiftly.

The main object of your seclusion is, of course, to avoid friction, worry, and excitement. You know that you are bound to return to the treadmill and the crank at the expiration of some ten days or so; and each recurring twenty-four hours of tranquillity are so much balm in a peaceful Gilead. One little drawback only is there to your felicity. You are unable wholly to banish the demon of noise, disturbance, and excitement, seeing that if you are fond of walking about the streets and looking into the shops you are in a continuous state of nervous anxiety lest you should be run over.

Of the statistics of street accidents in Paris I have no accurate information, but it strikes me that the annual aggregate of casualties due to blundering and reckless driving must be tremendous. Since Thursday, the sixth, I have rarely ventured further in the direction of the Madeleine than the Rue Drouot; but between that thoroughfare and the Rue du Faubourg Montmartre there are at least half a score of crossings dangerous enough to make the blood of the elderly, the short-sighted, and the nervous, run cold, every time they essay to traverse them. For safe crossing of the boulevards some slight facilities are provided in the planting here and there of granite islands of refuge, similar to those in London; but the municipal authorities in Paris have not yet bethought themselves of affixing to the insular lamp-posts placards with "Keep to the Right" or "Left" inscribed upon them; and drivers who ought to keep to the right very often mingle with those going left, and vice versa.

The chief dangers affecting locomotion in Paris would appear to be four in number. First the smooth, noiseless, asphalté pavement. Next the gigantic three-horsed omnibuses, crowded inside and out with passengers, which are permitted to "pound" along, not only the great boulevards, but such narrow thoroughfares as the Rue de Richelieu and the Rue Vivienne, and even the narrower lanes which at right angles intersect the streets just named. Thirdly, the "crawling" cabs, the proportion of which to the active vehicles seems to be very much larger than is the case in London; and, lastly, the fact that a great many of the drivers of the "crawlers" are half or wholly asleep on their boxes; while a great many more of cochers who are driving furiously are manifestly drunk. Our own malpractices in the matter of locomotion are numerous and grievous enough; but I maintain that the carriage traffic of London is at least three times better managed than that of Paris.

I am exceedingly reluctant to revive the controversy as to the proper colour of the Franciscan habit; but the question has now passed out of the fanciful domain of stage costume into that of archaeology and ecclesiology; and I am bound, in the interests of fairness, to take note of what antiquaries of weight and authority have to say on the subject. I contend that the proper hue of the habit in question is ashen grey, and not brown. I recapitulate my authorities. They are the Jesuit Father Bonanni, in his "Catalogue of the Religious Orders;" Alban Butler, in his "Lives of the Saints;" and Stow, who states distinctly that the Franciscans who came from Pisa, in Italy, in the thirteenth century, were Grey Friars. And they founded a historic monastery by that name. To these authorities I now add the famous Nuremberg master, Jost Amman, who, in a Monastic Vestiarium published at Frankfurt in 1586, has drawn the Franciscan in his habit as he lived in the sixteenth century, and appended to the drawing a Latin distich stating the colour of the habit to be ashen grey.

On the other hand, a learned correspondent, "E. W. G.," not only an amateur but a professed expert in archaeology, maintains that in all the drawings, paintings, and coloured statuettes which he has seen, dating from the thirteenth to the fifteenth centuries, the Franciscan habit is rendered of a colour which is now known as brown. In the National Gallery, for example, my learned correspondent proceeds to point out—(No. 569) Orcagna makes the habit russetty brown; (663) Angelico, a distinct yellow-brown; (667) Filippo Lippi, the same; and that (283) Gozzoli, (1075) Perugino, (807) Crivelli, (398) Filippino Lippi, (598) Moretto, Fiorenzo di Lorenzo, and (230) Zurbaran, all paint it a more or less yellow-brown. Again, "E. W. G." refers to a vast number of illuminated MSS. in the British Museum, which MSS. he has carefully gone through, noted, and sketched from, and he has been unable to find an example of a Franciscan friar in a grey habit.

On leaving London I wrote to a dear friend in Rome, begging him to obtain, if he possibly could, some information from monastic sources on the matter in hand. I have just received in reply, dated Good Friday, a highly interesting communication, too lengthy to insert in its entirety, but of which I will briefly summarise the gist. I learn that the Rev. Father Guardian of the Irish Franciscans of St. Isidore on the Pincian Hill "has no doubt that the habit worn by St. Francis was ashen grey or grey," and that "he asserts positively that it was the colour of the earlier habit of the Order." I learn on the same high authority that the origin of the costume is related by Alessandro Guidi in his monograph on "The Basiliche di San Francesco di Assisi," and that in the earliest or one of the earliest representations of St. Francis—a portrait painted under the direction of his contemporaries and disciples a few years after his death by Giunta Pisano, and now in the Sacristy of Assisi—the Saint wears a grey habit. See also Mrs. Jameson's "Legends of the Monastic Orders," p. 248.

On Easter Monday died at a great age, in her hotel close to the Faubourg St. Honoré, the widow of the famous French novelist, Honoré de Balzac. She had survived her illustrious husband full thirty years. Madame Eve de Balzac was a noble Polish lady, the Countess de Hanska, and was a widow, when, after a long courtship, she bestowed her hand on the author of "La Comédie Humaine," who, I was reading the other day, was not elected an Academician, "in consequence of his enormous debts." The financial biography of Balzac is as mysterious as that of Rembrandt, to say nothing of Raphael Mengs, who earned ten thousand ducats a year as a court painter, and left scarcely enough to bury him. The noble Polish widow who became the wife of Honoré de Balzac was, however, the possessor of an ample fortune; yet, according to the Paris Figaro, she died poor.

In the vast hotel occupied by the late Madame Eve de Balzac, her husband died. It is now Number Seventy-two in the street, which, in veneration of his memory, the Municipality of Paris have named after him. Next door, and forming the angle of the Rue Balzac and the Faubourg St. Honoré, is the hotel of Madame de Balzac's daughter, the Countess de Mnizeck. As for the Hotel Balzac, it is described as having been falling, for some time past, literally into ruins. The saloons have not been swept or dusted for years. But, if this "habitation mystérieuse" contains a tithe of the paintings, sculpture, and articles of virtù collected during long years of labour and self-denial by the writer of "Le Père Goriot" and "Eugénie Grandet," the Balzac sale will, indeed, be a wonderful one. Balzac was as ardent a hunter of bric-à-brac as his "Cousin Pons," in the "Parents Pauvres."

Mem.: There is a graphic history of the great novelist's courtship in the "Lettres d'Honoré de Balzac," of which an excellent English translation (by Charles Kenney?) was published two or three years ago by Mr. Bentley. Balzac was close upon fifty years of age when he married; but he was very scrupulous in obtaining permission to become a Benedict from his aged mother, whom he addresses as "votre fils soumis." The best accounts that I know of the Man, are "Balzac en Pantoufles," the "Balzac: Essai sur l'Homme et sur l'Œuvre," by M. Armand Buschet (the learned explorer of Venetian archives), and a very curious monograph, the exact title of which I forget, by the "realistic" writer Champfleury. The drollest mention of the novelist that I ever came across was in a grave English review, a writer in which spoke of "the frivolous romances of Balzac and Paul de Kock." Balzac and Paul de Kock! Shakespeare and the Musical Glasses! I suppose that, since the days of Pascal, France has had no greater Thinker than the writer of "La Peau de Chagrin" and "La Recherche de l'Absolu."

The necrology of the last few days has been indeed mournfully interesting in an exceptional degree; and it is not foreign, I hope, to my attributes as "the compiler of a column of gossip" (thanks, "Atlas") to draw attention to the passing away of distinguished, or once distinguished, personages. On Tuesday last at the church of San Sulpice were performed the obsequies of M. Le Play, a Senator and Grand Officer of the Legion of Honour. A great crowd of aristocrats and ex-dignitaries of the Second Empire were present at the funeral. Yet possibly it is only to a comparatively restricted number of English readers that the name of the late M. Le Play presents any purport or significance. But Sir Henry Cole will remember the deceased gentleman well enough. So will Sir Philip Cunliffe Owen, and the majority of our great manufacturing firms will preserve a vivid recollection of the whilom autocrat of the Champ de Mars. M. Le Play, an old pupil of the Ecole Polytechnique, and an engineer, I think, by profession, was the Chief French Commissioner of the Exposition Universelle of 1867. It might be said of him, as a ruler of things exhibitional, as it was said of the Great Napoleon as an administrator, that he had "a hand of iron with a velvet glove"—only, as the satirical lady put it, he sometimes forgot to put on his glove.

"The Glories of our Birth and State are Shadows, not Substantial Things." The late Commissioner of the Paris Exhibition of 1867 seemed sensible of the principle embodied in the noble old English poem, for he left express testamentary directions that the military honours to which he was entitled as a Grand Officer of the Legion of Honour were not to be paid to his remains, and that no discourse whatsoever was to be pronounced over his grave. Indeed, the epoch, the dynasty, and the social organisation under the sway of which he played his part on the world's stage is as completely dissolved and evanished as the long series of concentric couloirs with dish-cover roofs, in which were housed the treasures of International Art and Industry from May to October, 1867. I can see the opening spectacle in my mind's eye now. M. Le Play, "en grand uniforme," radiant, ushering Napoleon III. through the machinery department. The Empress Eugénie laughing and chatting with Lord Houghton. Military bands playing "Partant pour La Syrie." Loud shouts of "Vive l'Empereur!" M. Pietri, Prefect of Police, looking quite happy.

And later, in the summer, the Distribution of Prizes by the Emperor at the Palais de l'Industrie. Such a gorgeous pageant! The Sultan Abdul Aziz (him whom they slew with scissors) with a diamond aigrette, worth a hundred and fifty thousand pounds, in his fez. Kings and Princes galore of our own and of Continental Blood Royal. And M. Le Play, in grander uniform (he had been promoted to the rank of Senator), and looking more radiant than ever. The people of the Press, who (thanks to Sir Henry Cole), had gotten an excellent place whence to view the show, and take notes for printing of it, could not help remarking that the voice of Napoleon III. while he made his speech from his Imperial throne was even more strident and monotonous than usual, and that once or twice he faltered in his delivery. It was as noticeable as he, and the Sovereigns, and the Princes, and their splendid trains, swept processionally by, that the Emperor's countenance was more than usually cadaverous, and had come to assume something of that greenish tinge which, according to Mr. Kinglake, it wore at Solferino.

There was need for the poor gentleman to look ill, and to feel ill. He had in his pocket a despatch which, in hot haste, had been brought by a courier from Havre. That despatch had come from Vera Cruz, in Mexico, to Havana, and so to St. Thomas, and thence to France. It told how on a certain day the hapless Maximilian of Hapsburg had been shot to death at Queretaro; but in ink yet invisible, but soon to be made terribly legible, that despatch might have been inclosed with the monition that this was the Beginning of the End, that the Medes and Persians were at the gate—and that To-morrow was coming: To-morrow, which was to be disgrace and defeat and the bare deal planks and tin tacks of the throne as To-day was its crimson velvet and gold lace. Yes; M. Le Play was very wise to deprecate salvos of musketry and long-winded oraisons funèbres over his grave. The order of things to which he belonged was buried in quicklime a dozen years ago.

I left London for Paris before the number of this Journal for the current week was published; and on Easter Monday, not venturing (for reasons at which I have already hinted) into the English quarter of Paris, I was unable to procure a copy of the Illustrated London News. But, dropping into the Café de la Bourse, and happening to take up Galignani's Messenger, I was delighted to find that the whole of the current page of "Echoes"—"lock, stock, and barrel," title and all—had been "lifted" into Galignani. Is this compliment paid to our Journal every week, I wonder? Some people would call it freebooting; but I regard it as a piece of patronage for which I ought to be humbly grateful. Furthermore, it points a distinct moral, to the effect that to whomsoever the privileges of copyright shall be extended, those privileges shall not be enjoyed, even to the most homœopathic extent, by the miserable creatures who write original articles in newspapers.

This page may be but a compilation of gossip, but it gives me every week an immensity of trouble; and I may respectfully hint that I cudgel my brains and wear out my eyes in poring over musty books for my own benefit and that of the proprietors and readers of the Illustrated London News, and not for the benefit of the proprietors of Galignani's Messenger. If Galignani were published in the centre of Africa, or in the middle of the Great Desert of Gobi, it would be another matter; but, as it is, the London papers which leave Charing-cross by the early mail-train are, as a rule, on sale at the kiosques on the Paris boulevards by eight the same evening. If Galignani requires a column of gossip, why does not my contemporary employ a "compiler" of its own, with a sharp pair of scissors and a discriminating eye to snip up paragraphs "all round the shop"? But is it quite a fair piece of journalism to slash all my little chickens and their dam—I mean my paragraphs and the initials appended thereto—at one fell swoop of the bright steel?

But all things bearing on copyright (do you know that the House of Commons were once very nearly giving a twenty-four hours copyright to original articles in newspapers) are a mystery. Some of them are absolutely phenomenal; and I can recall few more surprising instances of spontaneous legal erudition and inherent literary and antiquarian culture than have recently been manifested by the accomplished actress whose admirable performance at the Globe Theatre in the play of "Mankind" I had lately the pleasure of witnessing and of chronicling. Mrs. Marie Litton Robertson, as an intellectual phenomenon, beats even that wonderful man Mr. Pinero, who has only to saunter in the green lanes of Kent, gathering wild roses and sweetbriar as he saunters, for any number of plots of new and original plays to be evolved from his internal consciousness. In her first letter to the Times on the subject of dramatic copyright, Mrs. Marie Litton Robertson proved herself a jurisconsult, to whom old Coke might have dedicated his Littleton, while Noyes (of the "Maxims") might have pulled off his coif to her, and Selden saluted her as "his learned Sister." Henceforward, most forensic madam, play nothing but Portia in the Trial Scene.

But a greater achievement remained behind. In a further letter to the Times the lady has revealed herself as a profound Shakespearean scholar and biographer. She knows where the bard obtained all the plots of his plays—what Italian novelists he laid under contribution and what contemporary dramatists he "cribbed" from. I am only astonished to find that the learned lady has omitted to draw attention to Milton's indebtedness in "Paradise Lost" to Du Bartas; to Spenser's unacknowledged borrowing of the first four (and apocryphal?) lines of the "Æneid," in the prologue to the "Faerie Queene;" to Archdeacon Paley's impudent appropriation of the scheme and many of the arguments in the "Natural Theology" from a Dutch moralist; and to Goldsmith's barefaced paraphrase in his bull of "Madam Blaise" of the Frenchman De la Monnoye. MASONIC FANCY BAZAAR AT DUBLIN.

In aid of the fund required for completing and furnishing the new building of the Masonic Female Orphan School, in Merrion-road, Dublin, to which the Freemasons of Ireland have already subscribed a large sum, a Bazaar and Fancy Fair is held this week in the Dublin Exhibition Palace. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Connaught and her Excellency the Countess Cowper, wife of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, are patronesses of this Bazaar, and many ladies of good position have consented to preside at the stalls. There was a grand vocal and instrumental concert on Tuesday evening, but the opening ceremonial took place on Wednesday; it was followed, in the evening of that day, by a literary and musical entertainment, in which the pupils of the school took part, and in the course of which the Rev. Dr. Tisdall recited a poetical address, composed by Dr. J. F. Waller, upon the theme of the historic and social character of Freemasonry, and the claim of orphans to compassion. On Thursday evening, there was a diorama to be exhibited, and on Friday, an amateur dramatic performance. The bazaar, or fancy fair, presents some remarkable features, which are partly shown in our illustration. The Leinster Hall of the Exhibition Palace has been converted into a picturesque "old street," with "Shakspeare's House" at the upper end. All the quaint and beautiful buildings have been sketched from originals of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries by Mr. Bingham M'Guinness, President of the Dublin Sketching Club; and the whole has been constructed and decorated in the highest style of scenic art by Mr. Farrar and other artists of the Dublin Gaiety Theatre. We congratulate the Irish gentlemen upon their taste and skill, which would seem not inferior to that shown in the "Olde Englysshe Fayre," some time since produced in London; while we observe with pleasure that they have sought examples among the old-fashioned houses of Chester, Stratford-on-Avon, Gloucester, Shrewsbury, Coventry, and Winchester. A portion of the design occupied by the Belfast and Midland Counties Stall, near the corner of the Leinster Hall, opposite to the Shakspeare House and Pupil's Stall, has been suggested by sketches from the "Old Tabard Inn," pulled down a few years ago in Southwark, where it had remained in actual use from the middle of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, till its demolition in the course of some building improvements. The recesses and rude balconies under the roof are very interesting, and the general effect of the old house has been carefully studied. The timbered houses brought together in this street represent the prevailing character of the dwellings and shops of the merchant and trader burgesses. They were built with large, heavy timber framing, the interspaces of which were filled in with bricks, lath and plaster, or weather boardings. The gables ornamented with "barge boards" and casements, and the roofs were covered with red tiles, and ornamented with dormer-windows to admit light and air to the rooms in the fine large roofs. Among the ladies who kept stalls were the Marchioness of Donegal and the Countess of Huntingdon.

THE LATE DR. JOHN MUIR.

This eminent Sanscrit scholar, a retired member of the Indian Civil Service, died at Edinburgh on the 7th ult., in the seventy-third year of his age. Dr. John Muir, brother to Sir William Muir, K.C.S.I., of the India Council of Government, was a native of Glasgow, and received his early education at the grammar school at Irvine and the University of Glasgow. He afterwards attended Haileybury College, the training institution for young men destined for the Civil Service of the East India Company. In 1829 he was passed through the college at Fort William, Calcutta, with distinction. His merits were soon recognised, and he was selected for the position of Assistant-Secretary to the Board of Revenue at Allahabad. Subsequently he received the appointment of Commissioner for the investigation of claims to hold land rent free in the division of Meerut. His next appointment was that of magistrate and collector of Azimghur. He became singularly proficient in the knowledge of Sanscrit, and when Mr. Thompson, Lieutenant-Governor of the North-Western Provinces, carried out his idea of amalgamating the English and Sanscrit branches of study to be conducted in one Anglo-Indian college, Mr. Muir was appointed first Principal of Victoria College, Benares. He held that position a year, during which time he got the college into good working order. Returning to the judicial branch of the service, he held for some years the office of Civil and Sessions Judge at Futtehpoore. In 1854 he retired from the service, and afterwards resided chiefly in Edinburgh. He took great interest in the improvement of the Scottish Universities, and in 1862 he founded the chair of Sanscrit and Comparative Philology in the University of Edinburgh. He was the means of raising the Shaw Fellowship in moral philosophy in memory of his relative Sir James Shaw, who was long connected with the Corporation of London. He also instituted the Muir Lectures on comparative religion, which have hitherto been delivered by Principal Fairbairn, of Bradford. Dr. Muir was a member of the last Scotch University Commission. A number of years ago he published "Sanscrit Texts," a standard work in great repute, and more recently numerous metrical translations from the Sanscrit. The deceased was unmarried. He was a D.C.L. of Oxford, an LL.D. of Edinburgh University, a Doctor of Philosophy of the University of Bonn, and an honorary member of several foreign learned societies. The portrait of Dr. Muir is from a photograph by Mr. J. Moffat, of Prince's-street, Edinburgh.

PORTSMOUTH MINNESINGERS' CLUB.

His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, who arrived at Portsmouth, with the Duke of Cambridge, on Saturday evening, was the guest of Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, the General Commanding the Military Division there, at Government House. Two or three hours after his arrival, the Prince of Wales, accompanied by Prince Edward, attended a smoking concert of the Portsmouth Minnesingers at the Portland Hall, Southsea. The club, of which his Serene Highness is president, consists of singing and non-singing members, composed mainly of naval and military officers, and was formed in 1876. Its "At Homes," at which the pleasures of social intercourse are blended with the delights of vocal music, are much sought after. Ladies, of course, are not invited to its smoking concerts, and, as a rule, ceremony is dispensed with. On the present occasion, however, the members and guests appeared in evening dress or undress uniform. The gathering was very large, as the Minnesingers had sent invitations to the senior officers of all the Volunteer corps which had arrived in Portsmouth, and also to the regimental messes of the garrison. The front of the stage was ornamented with beautiful flowering and greenhouse plants; and at the back a trophy in the shape of the Prince's feathers had been constructed of sword-bayonets and broadswords. Nine o'clock was fixed as the time for the concert to begin, but it was not until half-past ten that the presentation of arms by the 3rd Hants Volunteers, who composed a guard of honour outside the hall, and the hush which simultaneously prevailed inside, announced the arrival of his Royal Highness. In the meantime, the string band of the Royal Marine Artillery, which was posted in the gallery, had been helping to pass away the time by appropriate selections from "Patience." At ten o'clock spirits were handed round, and when the Prince of Wales arrived the hall was being gradually filled with clouds of tobacco smoke. As his Royal Highness is Captain-General and Colonel of the Honourable Artillery Company of London, and Honorary Colonel of the Huntingdonshire Light Horse, the 2nd Cambridgeshire Rifles, the 12th (Civil Service) Middlesex Rifles, the 1st (Oxford University) Oxfordshire Volunteers, and the Sutherland Rifles, he has an ample choice of Volunteer uniforms. On the present occasion the Prince wore the grey and blue livery of the Civil Service Corps, one of the least conspicuous in the hall. On his Royal Highness taking his seat in front of the stage, with Prince Edward, Lord Ranelagh, Lord Elcho, Lord Henry Lennox, Admiral Ryder, Admiral Foley, and others round about, Mr. Charles M'Cheane, one of the original founders of the club and its leading tenor, came forward and sang, "God Bless the Prince of Wales," the chorus being sung by the whole audience upstanding and accompanied by the band in the gallery, the whole being conducted by Mr. J. Winterbottom. Next followed some fine part-singing, interspersed with both vocal and instrumental solos. Mr. Henry Leslie, who had composed two concerted pieces for the club, "A Lullaby" and "The Song of the Minnesingers," came down from London for the purpose of personally conducting them, and met with a flattering reception. Mr. M'Cheane gave an appreciative interpretation of "Her Name" (Blumenthal), and Captain Arthur Byng a very spirited rendering of "The Midshipmite." The other solo singers were Mr. Dudley Watkins and Colonel Maclean, both of whom were greatly applauded. Mr. Winterbottom introduced a comic element into the gathering by some diverting variations upon the bassoon, which appeared highly to amuse the Prince. Messrs. Charles Fletcher and Zohr contributed solos on the violin and the piano. Encores were not accepted, but midnight arrived before the concert concluded. Their Royal Highnesses afterwards supped at the Minnesingers' Club room, with the following members of the committee:—Mr. Charles M'Cheane, Major Bulkeley, Mr. Henry Leslie, Captain Byng, Mr. Thomas Cousins, Colonel Tuson, Mr. W. Gillman, Captain Alexander, Captain St. Claire, Mr. Dudley Watkins, Mr. A. F. Perkins, and Dr. Murrell.

THE SCULLING CHAMPIONSHIP RACE ON THE TYNE.

Our Illustration shows the scene on the Tyne, on Monday week, at the moment of the great Anglo-Canadian sculling race for the Championship of the World and one thousand pounds, between Edward Hanlan, of Toronto, and Robert Watson Boyd, of Middlesbrough-on-Tees. It was witnessed by more than a hundred thousand spectators. Two special trains ran from London, and nearly eighty excursion trains carried sightseers from all parts of the North, including such distant places as Birmingham, Leeds, and Glasgow. The High Level, Redheugh, and Suspension Bridges were thickly crowded, though special rates were charged for admission to them. About twenty steamers were in attendance to accompany the race, all full of people. The weather was dull and rainy, but the river was in good condition for the race, the surface being smooth, and the wind in favour of the boats. Hanlan was first afloat, and, as he launched from a timber-yard near the Mansion House and pulled out into the river, was greeted with tremendous cheering. He was attired, according to custom, in his blue sleeveless guernsey and short drawers. A minute later Boyd, who rowed without his jersey, came up from Hellgate, Gateshead, where he had embarked. He was also cheered most enthusiastically. Boyd was seated in a boat built by Messrs. Swaddle and Winship, of Scotswood; the one used by the champion was the workmanship of Messrs. Phelps and Peters, of Putney. Amid breathless excitement the rivals stationed themselves at their stake-boats in front of the Mansion House, and in a few minutes a start was effected. Boyd, who appeared nervously eager, got away quickest in front, pulling 39 to the minute, Hanlan contenting himself with about 37, and at Davidson's Quay Boyd held a lead of a third of a length. But Hanlan, with his long stroke, was sending his boat through the water so well, that his opponent failed to increase his lead. Boyd, at the same time, was rowing smartly, and his style was decidedly better than he had ever before shown. The Canadian now put on a spurt, quickening up to nearly 40, and quickly lessened the distance that had previously divided his boat from the north-countryman's. Still, Boyd strained every nerve, and was encouraged by tremendous applause from the banks. A desperate struggle up to Wylie's Quay ensued; but soon after the champion got level, and, rowing in much better form than Boyd, drew to the fore. He gradually increased his advantage, and though Boyd continually spurred, he was incapable of keeping up with the rate of speed at which his opponent was travelling, and at Skinner Burn Gangway had fallen a quarter of a length in the rear. Hanlan sculled in beautiful style, but Boyd was scarcely so finished in his execution, and it was evident that he was rapidly tiring. At the Grindstone Quay the Canadian led by a full half-length, and shot through Redhugh Bridge in 2 min. 27 sec. from the start with a lead of fully a length and three quarters. Hanlan now saw that he held the race well in hand, and dashed along merrily. Just opposite the Shot Tower he crossed over a little and treated Boyd to a heavy backwash, which added immensely to the Tees sculler's discomfiture. Scarcely, however, had he taken up this position than he seemed to repent of hampering an already beaten antagonist; and, putting in half a dozen strong strokes, he drew away with a lead of nearly three lengths. Then he eased down, stopped rowing altogether, and had a good look round. Near New Quay Corner Hanlan held a lead of three lengths, striking only about 23 to the minute, whilst Boyd was toiling on hopelessly at 32. There was a tremendous burst of applause at this point; and a little later on Hanlan stopped and bowed repeatedly to the spectators; then put in a dozen strong strokes, and increased his lead to slightly over three lengths. He reached Armstrong's Shearlegs in 8 min. 55 sec., Boyd being 35 sec. behind, and covered the two miles in 12 min. 14 sec. From this point Hanlan, sculling along in a leisurely style, eventually won by about four lengths, in 21 min. 25 sec. The length of the course is three miles and a half.

THE HERZEGOVINA INSURRECTION.

There was still continued fighting, last week, between the Austrian troops and the insurgents of Crivoscie, who resisted the endeavours that were made to drive them over the Montenegrin border. The following account is given of a recent conflict near Visovo, between the Visberg and the river Tara, where two columns of troops were sent by General Obadich:—

"After a short skirmish the insurgents retired in the direction of the Rogjet Mountain, pursued by the troops. While one body of the Austrians ascended the mountain, Major Przedak ordered a detachment to march to Stanjevo brdo. This latter force reached the topmost ridge of the Stanjevo heights at nine in the morning, and, looking down from this point into the rocky valley of the Tara, they saw a large body of insurgents crossing the stream on two rafts and driving their cattle before them. The troops immediately opened fire, and the remainder of the force, with a battery of artillery, also hurried to the ridge, from which a deadly fire was directed upon the insurgents as they were still in mid-stream. Numbers of them plunged into the water, one raft was sunk, and the other remained stationary. Some two hundred of the insurgents may have reached the other side. The descent from the heights was so difficult, owing to the precipitous nature of the ground, that the troops reached the bottom too late to come up with the insurgents who had fled up stream. Thirty-nine corpses were found on the banks of the Tara. The number of those who were drowned could not be ascertained. The troops sustained no loss whatever."

Our illustration represents a party of the mountaineers retiring to their home after an unsuccessful engagement with the Austrian troops.

GOOD FRIDAY AND EASTER.

The fine weather of yesterday week attracted many thousands of the metropolitan population to the more rural districts, and the traffic on the railways, trams, and steam-boats was very great. The weather continued fine, and the day proved a holiday which was more than commonly successful and enjoyable. Notwithstanding the large number of excursionists, the services at the metropolitan churches were well attended, and a large increase is observable this year in the number of afternoon services, as well as in the use of the Passion music in the churches. A number of distinguished singers took part in a concert of sacred music at the Crystal Palace. There was a large attendance, and the audience evinced an enthusiastic appreciation of the excellent entertainment afforded them. A concert of sacred music was given in the Alexandra Palace, conducted by Mr. Meyer Lutz, in which several distinguished artists took part.

Unusually large congregations thronged the various metropolitan churches on Sunday for the Easter services, which this year afforded evidence of a more largely developed taste for the devotional and triumphant music suited to this religious festival, which was also marked by a profusion of floral decorations.

The Bank Holiday on Monday was observed in London to fullest extent, and the enormous crowds who journeyed by road and rail were favoured by dry weather, though the sky was somewhat overcast. The attendances at various places of public resort were very large, and in some cases the figures are the largest on record for a similar day. The departure of "Jumbo" does not appear to have diminished the attractions of the Zoological Society's Gardens, which were thronged.

A set of three silver salvers and £500 have been forwarded by Sir H. Selwin-Ibbetson, M.P., in behalf of the subscribers, as a testimonial from the county of Essex, to Admiral M. Hardy, in recognition of his valuable services for a period of more than forty years as chief constable of the county.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

Paris, Tuesday, April 11.

It is the craze of the correspondents of London daily papers, and above all of the correspondent of the Times, to represent the French as being perpetually occupied with political machinations. In point of fact, politics now play a very small rôle in the thoughts of the French: the favourite attitude of the day is that of indifference. In politics, in religion, in art, in literature, indifference is the order of the day. The era of illusions is past. Gambetta, Victor Hugo, Chambord, Jules Simon, and the rest, broken idols! The Republic, universal suffrage, sovereignty of the people, words, words! The Ministers, mediocrities! The deputies, humbugs! The Senators, dotards! And amidst this hurricane of depreciation what remains? Everything. Depreciation is, and has been for ages, a favourite amusement of the Parisians. "A Paris on s'amuse en blamant tout" was a remark made by M. de Custine half a century ago. The observation is now as true as ever it was.

The marriage of Mlle. Sarah Bernhardt has given the depreciators a fine opportunity for developing their talent; and in the multiplicity of fantastic reports that have been printed about this fantastic union future biographers will find it hard to discern the truth. After all, when one sees how the history of the present day is written, one fairly loses confidence in the history of the past. Here, for instance, is M. Damala, the husband of Dona Sol, described by some as a Greek, by others as a native of Marseilles. Some give his name as Jacques; others maintain that it is Aristide Ambroise. Some say that he has been in the diplomatic service; others represent him as a simple "bagman" in the silk trade. From personal knowledge, all I can say is that he is a handsome man, between twenty-five and thirty years of age; and that the marriage is a pure love-match. The Parisians will, of course, remain sceptical, and the examples of Patti, Heilbron, Judic, and a dozen other actresses who have married, justifies them in anticipating that the rôle of le mari de Mlle. Bernhardt will prove the most difficult that M. Damala has yet undertaken.

It appears that Christine Nilsson is about to return to the operatic stage. It will be remembered that her husband, M. Rouzand, died insane, shortly after the disaster of the Union Générale. Madame Nilsson's fortune was seriously compromised, and now, in order to repair the breaches, she intends to sing for three years. She leaves Paris on the 15th for London, where she will remain two months. Next year she intends to visit Russia, and the following year Sweden. At the end of her three-years' campaign, she hopes to be able to return to Paris and to live quietly, comme une bourgeoisie que je suis, to use her own words.

The Easter holidays have been favoured with splendid weather, and everywhere the crowds of pleasure-seekers have been innumerable. On Sunday and Monday the "swells" and some thousands of the pretentious folk flocked to the races at Auteuil and Longchamps, while the populace feasted its eyes and ears on the sights and din of the gingerbread fair. The whole town was out of doors. There is nothing new to be said about the "Foire aux pains d'épice." The spectacle is the same this year as it was last year or the year before. There are the same mountains of gingerbread, the same tooth-drawers, the same monstrosities—African Venuses, fat women, torpedo women; the same circuses and theatres; the same extra-lucid somnambulists; the same bewildering, whirling maze of fandangos, roundabouts and merry-go-rounds. It is simply the fair of Saint Cloud or the "Fête des loges" in the streets of Paris; and in order not to be eclipsed by the splendours of the Avenue de l'Opéra, the mountebanks have invested in Jablochkoff lamps and run their roundabouts by steam-power.

The Paris journals are greatly amused at the stoppage of the works of the Channel Tunnel. At first they did not believe the report, but after perusing the prose of the Times and the Saturday Review, of Herbert Spencer and Frederic Harrison, the République Française smiles benignantly at the childish fears of John Bull; while Auguste Vacquerie in the Rappel finds exceeding drollery in the spectacle of this great nation against which Philippe II. and Napoleon were powerless, and which trembles before M. Perrichon (the hero of Labiche's amusing comedy "Le Voyage de M. Perrichon").

The deaths occurred last week of the eminent senator and writer on jurisprudence, M. Bértauld, and of M. Le Play. M. Le Play was a pupil of the Polytechnic, engineer and professor at the School of Mines. He was president of the committee of organisation of the Universal Exhibition of 1855, French commissioner at London in 1862, and president of the organising committee of the Exhibition of 1867. He was a senator under the Empire, Grand Officer of the Legion of Honour, author of a quantity of scientific memoirs, and, altogether, a considerable man. He was aged seventy-six.

A man, who was for a long time one of the celebrities of Paris, the lion-tamer Martin, died recently at Overschie, a village near Rotterdam, where he spent the latter years of his life occupied principally in bottom-fishing and rose-growing. Henri Martin was born at Marseilles in 1793. His father was at one time a companion in arms of Masséna, the future Duc de Rivoli. The life and adventures of Martin were written some few years ago by M. Amédée Pichot, under the title of the "Mémoires d'un Dompteur," a volume well worth reading and containing a quantity of curious details about the great dompteur, who in the days of his glory about 1830 described his menagerie as a "Zoorama" and himself as the "Zoogymnaste breveté de son altesse royale Madame la Duchesse de Berry." Martin visited London and the provinces in 1831-2, and his famous piece, "The Lions of Mysore," was mounted at Drury-Lane. Martin retired in 1840. His animals formed the nucleus of the Rotterdam Zoological Garden, of which he was for some time curator. Martin figures as the type of the lion-tamer in several of the novels of Balzac and Eugène Sue.

I must conclude my necrological record by mentioning the death of Madame de Balzac, which occurred on Monday night, after a long illness, in her house, 22, Rue Balzac. T. C.

The annual report by Colonel Harrison Trent, recently issued, on musketry instruction in the Army, supplied detailed formation as to the shooting in the different branches of the service, which it shows is improving, and suggests means likely to encourage further improvement.

Lord Balfour of Burleigh laid the foundation-stone of the new Forth Bridge at Alloa on the 5th inst., in presence of a large company of spectators. The structure, which will be of a very strong and massive character, is to consist of seventeen spans—two of 100 ft. each, two of 80 ft., and thirteen of 68 ft. It will rest on twenty stone piers. The breadth outside the girders is to be 17 ft. 2 in. and 14 ft. inside. It will be constructed for one line of rails. One of the prominent features will be two opening spans swinging on a strong central pier in the fairway of the river's channel. The estimated cost is between £30,000 and £40,000.

PLAYHOUSES.

Mr. G. W. Godfrey is henceforward to be numbered amongst the elect. He has been purged from the original sin that is supposed to jeopardise the future state of every adaptor, and he has certainly written a comedy which for neatness of construction and freshness of dialogue is of remarkable merit. As the audience was settling down in the comfortable stalls of the Court Theatre to witness the first performance of "The Parvenu," a lady in my immediate neighbourhood, listlessly taking up her playbill, wondered "if it was, as usual, one of those dreadful plays taken from the French or from some other language," and was pleased to express her doubts as to the possibility of any English author saying anything new, or pretending to be original. And yet this same supercilious critic must have enjoyed some very delightful evenings at this pleasant theatre, in the teeth of the unpardonable sins of adaptation, translation, and reproduction. Did she ever see, I wonder, Mrs. Kendal play in "The Ladies' Battle," by Scribe? was she altogether disgusted with the dramatic ingenuity of Sardou in "The Scrap of Paper?" did she ruffle her skirts and leave the house in indignation when Madame Modjeska appeared as Adrienne Lecouvreur? was it a crime on the part of Mr. W. G. Wills to turn Goldsmith's "Vicar of Wakefield" into a play for Miss Ellen Terry? has this sneering fair creature ever in her lifetime laughed at "Box and Cox," and does she know that the materials of this immortal farce are found in two French plays "Frisette" and "La Chambre à deux Lits"? and would she push her argument to the point of absurdity by declaring it to be a crime to produce Shakspeare in France and Molière in England? Is there more moral guilt in reproducing the masterpieces of Victor Hugo and Sardou on our stage than in reading Daudet and Octave Feuillet in the study? Or again, not to strain the point further than Mr. Godfrey himself, may I ask what possible harm he did to his fellow-creatures, to the stage, or to dramatic art by giving us some time back a third version of "Le Fils de Famille," called "The Queen's Shilling"? Leigh Murray and David Fisher had already appeared and delighted the playgoers of their immediate time in "The Lancers" and "The Discarded Son." Why, then, should not Mr. and Mrs. Kendal restore to us an old pleasure from the same interesting story and human theme? Until I can be persuaded that the dramatists of all time have not borrowed for their own purpose the best available material; that Shakspeare is not the most conspicuous example of a borrower of plots to be humanised by his incomparable genius; that true originality is not an undiscovered quantity; and that a bad original work is better than a good adapted one, I shall continue to laugh in my sleeve when I hear these illogical tirades on originality.

I desire to speak with the highest respect of Mr. Godfrey's new play. He has accomplished a most difficult task in keeping an audience both interested and amused with so simple a story, illustrated by only one scene. He has handled his subject, to my thinking, like an artist; and, though I may be in a minority, I consider his third act is the best, because every third act is a test of constructive ability, and here the interest progresses until it culminates with decision and effect. But as to originality, the red rag so often flaunted in our faces and supposed to be numbered amongst the special virtues of dramatic composition, what are we to say about the originality of this pretty and complete story? It is not taken from the French; it is English pure and simple; but is it original to tell us about match-making mothers sacrificing their children for the sake of wealth? of well-bred fathers making friendships with vulgar snobs who have lent them money, or of charming girls falling in love with the young men who have rescued them from a position of danger? Are there not ten thousand novels in which love is started by this or similar adventures? I don't like Mr. Godfrey's play the less because its story, its characters, its design, and its tone are familiar to me. On the contrary, I admire all the more the art with which he has refashioned an oft-told tale. There is more nonsense talked about originality than on any other subject connected with the stage. The really curious feature of "The Parvenu" is the skill with which Mr. Godfrey has made a hero out of one of the most vulgar fellows who ever swaggered on the stage, and yielded gracefully to the English failing of wealth-worship. The landed proprietor is at present in a very unenviable position. He cannot get his rents in Ireland; he is threatened with a mild form of Communism in England; he is met everywhere with a too wholesale application of the "I-am-as-good-as-a-man-as-you-are" doctrine; and now it has come to this, that he has to stand aside on the stage to be lectured by a man whose sole virtue is summed up in one word—success. For what is the hero of this play, this Ledger, M.P., who poses as the pivot of the new comedy of society. "No hero, I confess," as Mr. Browning would say. A promoter of swindling companies, picking up his money in any dirty fashion that occurs to him; a man who buys a fine old property only to ruin it and desecrate its memories; a fellow who defies the most ordinary rules of grammar and orthoepy, boasting of his ignorance and reveling in his unrefinement. This is scarcely the person to lecture the poor old Baronet for his love of racing and horses, to ridicule him for wishing to make his daughter rich by the sacrifice of her happiness, or to obtain cheap sympathy by endowing with a slice of wealth the girl he loves, but who sternly refuses to marry him except under compulsion. There are no doubt many such men in the world as this vulgar fellow, men who climb to success on the shoulders of others and are prompt to kick away the ladder on the first opportunity, men who are tolerated in society for their wealth alone, and whose laches are condoned by gold; but it is a strange turn in the tide of human affairs when they become stage heroes in addition. Mr. Godfrey has held the mirror up to nature, and a very ugly face is reflected in it. The sympathy acquired by Mr. Ledger, M.P., is a curious sign of the times, but he would have been still more sympathetic and truer to nature had he risen to wealth by honest and not dishonest means. The harmony of the acting in this play is extremely refreshing. There is scarcely a discordant note. In no case is the task very severe; but it is everywhere accomplished with skill. I have never seen Mr. Anson, Miss Larkin, and Mr. H. Kemble to such advantage; and it is quite unjust to accuse any one of them of exaggeration. They are exactly what they ought to be in every shade and detail. Mr. Anson's personation of the vulgar, successful, and good-hearted hero is singularly vivid and truthful. His changes are sudden, but they are artistic; if the part were less highly coloured it would be under-acted. The love scenes, played by Mr. Forbes Robertson and Miss Marion Terry, are amongst the most charming that I can recall; and as a contrast to them we had Mr. John Clayton and Miss Lottie Venne in lighter and more boisterous comedy. Miss Venne will plead the example of Madame Chateaufort for those tricks and oddities of expression that her audience unfortunately encourage. But this clever French lady is a bad model. Her acting in "Divorçons" was in some parts quite indefensible and tricky to a fault. Miss Venne is also clever; but she should study Mrs. Bancroft, an actress she has so successfully imitated.

INSURRECTION IN THE HERZEGOVINA: INSURGENTS OF THE CRIVOSCIE RETURNING HOME.

The new burlesque at the Royalty is neither better nor worse than its innumerable predecessors. It is called "Sindbad," but I could not discover the faintest allusion to the famous old story in form, colour, or characterisation. There are dozens of smartly-dressed young ladies in fantastic nautical costume, a ship and a shipwreck, songs and dances, plentiful allusions to Mr. Bradlaugh, Mr. Parnell, and Jumbo, ballads sentimental, and popular melodies, and there is an old gentleman engaged in fishing at the back of the stage through the best part of the play, who does not speak a word, but is enthusiastically greeted at the close with a unanimous shout, "The Old Man of the Sea!" So I suppose he had some remote affinity to the Arabian legend. Mr. Harry Nicholls, who has a quaint manner, and Mr. Newham, who dances well, appear to be popular performers; but all the cleverness and charm of the entertainment centred in Miss Fannie Leslie, who played Sindbad, and Miss Edith Vane, who has a pretty voice and manner. The duets and songs in which these ladies were engaged were the features best worth remembering. An author is not always the best judge of the effect of his own work, and Mr. Arthur Mathison would be surprised to find what a contrary impression his little play called "Not Registered" has upon the audiences to that which he evidently intended. By no possibility could he have wished to condone the crime of a breach of trust on the part of a post-office official, whether aged or pretty, or to imply that there is any possible excuse for the crime of extracting bank notes from a letter passing through the post. And yet the dramatist seems to make light of the temporizing of the old postmaster and to excuse the incomprehensible silliness of his daughter, who is old enough to be intrusted with responsible duties, but, apparently, too innocent to understand the meaning of the eighth commandment. In its present state this is one of the most curious moral problems ever submitted to an audience. Mr. Everill, Mr. Mansfield, and Miss Evelyn get out of the difficulty remarkably well.

Before Mr. Robert Buchanan devoted himself to the task of "elevating" the love story of Paul Clifford and Lucy Brandon, and attempted to enlist our sympathies once more on behalf of Mr. Bulwer Lytton's fashionable highwayman, the subject had been pretty well exhausted on the minor stage. So far back as March 19, 1832, Mr. Benjamin Webster produced at the Coburg Theatre "Paul Clifford, the Highwayman of 1770," one of those dramas interspersed with music that were fashionable in those days. It was a strange mixture of slang and sensation, and contained an escape from Bridewell and a trial in open court, in which Paul addresses the jury at some length, but is eventually condemned to death by his own father. Mr. Webster played Augustus Tomlinson, the philosophical highwayman. Mr. Serle was Paul Clifford, and Mrs. Weston made much of a celebrated character, Mrs. Margaret Lobkins, alias Peggy Lobb, the landlady of the Mug. Amongst the songs of this old Coburg version I find the celebrated one set to one of Moore's melodies, beginning—

A temple to Cupid said Flora enchanted
I'll build in the garden, the thought is divine.

But the orthodox musical version of Paul Clifford was by Edward Fitzball, and, produced at Covent Garden in 1835, with Mr. Vale, Mr. Tilbury, and Mr. Collins in the cast. In this drama occur the celebrated song "Hurrah! for the Road!" and a truly Fitzballian ballad with this inimitable introduction—

I saw him but once—I saw him in sorrow,
It scarcely appeared as he ever had met,
He spoke not, he gazed not, 'twas only a sigh;
But oh! 'twas a sigh I shall never forget!

It seems a pity that Mr. Robert Buchanan with all his characteristic vigour and love of spirited effect should have devoted so much time to the elevation of the character of this rascally highwayman, who might have been left to sleep in peace with the Hinds, Duvals, Turpins, Jack Sheppards, and Macheaths of another age. It would take too long a time to discuss the moral turpitude of the scoundrels who have been immortalised by Gay, Harrison Ainsworth, and Bulwer Lytton; but there is something very distasteful in the "elevated" hero, who, after a career of unblushing profligacy, tries to persuade us that he might have been a good fellow if his father had not ruined and deserted his mother. In Mr. Benjamin Webster's play it was the unjust conviction of Paul Clifford by Mr. Brandon, and his subsequent imprisonment, that started his vicious career. This is at least intelligible. Most of the humour formerly conveyed by Dummie Dunnaker, and all the flash coves and thieves' associates having disappeared, the new play is merely a concentrated essence of dull decorum, containing love scenes without inspiration, and comic scenes unrelieved by humour. The new Paul Clifford is certainly not a vulgar play, as it was in 1832; but it is certainly a dull one as acted at the Imperial Theatre at Westminster. Mr. W. Rignold has not the manner for the highwayman Paul; nor has Miss Harriett Jay quite the experience or power requisite for so important and isolated a character as Lucy Brandon. This young lady has a charming presence, however, and evident intelligence. The rest will come. Mr. Buchanan deserves pity in that his play was not ready for production, in addition to the important fact that it was not cast with judgment; but from what I could hear of the play as it stands it did not strike me as being suitable to the temper of the audiences of to-day. Rarely indeed have poetical periods been so mangled on the stage. For the sake of elocution, the sooner we have a dramatic school the better. Actors and actresses can study with facility; but how few of them can deliver words with point and propriety. In the old days artists were said to mouth, but now they mumble.

I have had no opportunity at present of witnessing Mr. Buchanan's "Shadow of the Sword," at the Olympic, a play beset with misfortune on its first representation; or the new plays at the Standard, Sadler's Wells, and the Philharmonic; or, indeed, of enjoying a laugh over the Easter programme put forward by the Moore and Burgess Minstrels at the St. James's Hall. But I hope to repair the omission next week; unless before that time my respected "leader," whose initials are so familiar to you, has ended his holiday, and recrossed the "silver streak" for home again. C. S.

"Babil and Bijou," the most brilliant fairy-piece of the past decade, was on Saturday last revived with much splendour at the Alhambra Theatre by Mr. William Holland. Originally produced at Covent Garden by Mr. Boucicault with the avowed idea of regenerating the stage, "Babil and Bijou" enjoyed a prolonged run in spite of its cumbrous magnificence and "too too" elaborate grandeur, mainly relieved by the dulcet singing of Mr. Maas (now one of the foremost English tenors), and the charming freshness of Rivière's Spring chorus of youthful voices. "Babil and Bijou," now compressed within reasonable limits by Mr. Frank Green, whilst lacking not a jot of its former splendour, "goes" with infinite spirit at the Alhambra. Mr. Henry Walsham, the handsome Babil, won the first encore by his exquisite singing of the tenor song, "I live for thee alone," and rendered all his airs with good taste. Musically well supported likewise by Miss Constance Loseby as Mistegris, Mr. William Hogarth as Skepsis, Miss Kate Sullivan as Pragma, and Miss Jenny Beauclerc as Bijou, the spectacular opera has a most mirth-moving Auricomus in the droll humorous Harry Paulton, and boasts two ballets which vie with the grandest choreographic triumphs of the Alhambra, Mdlle. Pertoldi being the bright particular star of the Fish Ballet, and Mdlle. Palladino première danseuse in the extremely beautiful Ballet of the Seasons, the costumes of which have been tastefully designed by M. Wilhelm. "Babil and Bijou" closes with a scene of crowning splendour, remarkable for the brightness of the flashing armour worn by the Amazonian Army of the Princess of the Moon (Miss Maud Forrester). The fairyland scenery is from the brushes of MM. Beverly, Grieve, and Callcott, aided by the able stage management of Mr. Frank Hall, contributes in no small degree to the deserved success of the revival.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

There was a comparative lull in the racing world last week, the only meeting of any importance being that held at Nottingham. The entry for the Spring Handicap was a very poor one, still there were seven runners, and "the talent" were woefully out in their attempts to find the winner. Vale (7 st. 9 lb.), who put up 4 lb. extra to enable Wood to ride, had the most friends, and Sun of York (9 st. 1 lb.) and Sir Reginald (8 st. 7 lb.) were also well backed. Sun of York found his weight a widely different one from those under which he performed so successfully at Northampton, and the other two could only get places behind the veteran Reefer (8 st. 7 lb.), who ran away with the Chester Cup some seasons ago, and afterwards secured other races under heavy weights. Sir Reginald made amends for his defeat by a victory in the Rufford Abbey Plate on the following day, when Moccoco took the Bestwood Park Plate for the Duke of Hamilton.

The opening day of the Newmarket Craven Meeting was of a most enjoyable character, and seldom has it been inaugurated under more favourable circumstances, so far as the weather is concerned. The attendance was fairly good, although the eager throng that usually invade the Birdcage on a big anniversary was to a great extent absent. Sport opened with the Trial Stakes, which resolved itself into a match between Count de Lagrange and the Duke of Westminster, as represented by Lady Vesta and Candahar. The latter, who is by Scottish Chief—Fenella, and therefore half-sister to Douranee, won pretty easily at the finish. This is the first occasion on which these popular colours have been seen in public since the death of the Duchess of Westminster, and also the first win since John Porter has had charge of the Duke's horses at Kingsclere. The defeat of Petticoat in the Double Trial Plate was a matter of great surprise, as through the previous running in the Brocklesby Stakes she was thought to hold all opposed to her perfectly safe. The success of Mr. Craven was exceedingly popular, and that gentleman must be congratulated upon having made such a useful chance purchase, as we are informed that Pebble, who is a good-looking son of Macgregor and Mineralogy, was purchased as a foal at Doncaster for something like fifty or sixty pounds. The concluding event of the day—The Twenty-fourth Newmarket Biennial Stakes, proved most interesting, as, although there were five runners, the issue was virtually a match between Kingdom and Lord Falmouth's Little Sister. The latter was strongly fancied, and was greatly admired whilst being saddled in the Birdcage, as she has grown into a fine bloodlike and muscular filly. In the result, however, she cut up in a most disappointing fashion, Kingdom winning, without being called upon, by a good three lengths. The winner is a bay, son of Kingcraft and Light, and is in every respect as sound as a bell. He stands upon clean and beautifully-formed legs, with great power in the arms and thighs, back and loins, magnificent shoulders, and great depth of girth, whilst his action is close upon perfection; and he undoubtedly won his race in the style of a racehorse.

The second day was principally remarkable for the easy victory in the Newmarket Handicap of Spring Tide, by See-Saw—Primula, who, being nicely weighted for a four-year-old, with 7 st. 9 lb. only, had all his opponents in trouble one hundred yards from the winning-post, and cantered home the easiest of winners by twelve lengths, his nearest attendants being Nereid (five years, 8 st. 4 lb.) and Maskelyne (four years, 8 st. 5 lb.). The upset of the day, however, was the defeat of St. Marguerite (8 st. 4 lb.) and Little Sister (8 st. 4 lb.), in the Column Stakes, by the little-fancied Paragon (8 st. 10 lb.), as they were both heavily supported at short odds, but were beaten long before the Bushes were reached.

The Inter-University Racquet-Matches took place at Prince's last week, when the Cambridge men secured tolerably easy victories both in the double and single games. In the former, C. F. H. Leslie (Oriol) and M. C. Kemp (Hertford) again represented Oxford, and were opposed by two new men, in J. D. Cobbold and F. M. Lucas, both of Trinity. The match was, as usual, the best of seven games; and, as the Oxonians could only manage to win the third and fourth games, they were defeated by four to two, a result mainly due to the splendid services of Cobbold. In the single-handed match—the best of five games—Leslie was opposed by C. T. Studd (Trinity), and the latter won by three games to one.

The mastership of the East Kent foxhounds, which since the resignation of the Earl of Guilford has been held by Captain H. White, having again become vacant, has been accepted by Mr. E. Sworder. The Duke of Grafton has announced his intention of giving up the mastership of the Duke of Grafton's hounds, owing to ill-health.

The prospects of the cricket season appear to be good. A fine list of matches has been arranged for the Australian team, beginning with a match at Oxford on the 15th prox. Thirty-five matches are fixed, extending to Sept. 20. The arrangements of the different clubs and counties fixed also give promise of a stirring season in all parts of the country.

With the approach of summer we have the promise of a good yachting season, and the Royal Thames Yacht Club has issued its programme of matches to take place on June 12 in the Thames, followed by a Channel-match two days later from the Nore to Dover. The New Thames Yacht Club has also issued a programme of matches, to come off on the 27th proximo and June 10, as well as a Channel-match.

The steward of Sir Wilfrid Lawson, M.P., having reported that one of his farms in Cumberland had been re-let on a ten years' lease at an increased rental of £80 per annum, the hon. Baronet inquired who was responsible for the improvement, and being told that it had been effected by the tenant, Sir Wilfrid directed his steward to write out a cheque for £800, and forward it to the tenant.

The council of the Royal Horticultural Society has issued a circular to the Fellows with regard to the recent decision of the Court of Appeal, which the council believes will operate as an extinction of the rights of the debenture-holders, and will tend to facilitate an arrangement with the commissioners, for which purpose they are now endeavouring to enter into negotiations.

THE COURT.

Prince Leopold, who is fairly recovered from his accident, lunched with her Majesty on Good Friday, which was his birthday. Divine service was performed at the chalet by the Rev. Canon Anson, in the presence of the Royal family. The Good Friday procession at Mentone was witnessed by her Majesty from the balcony of the British Vice-Consulate, where she was received by the Vice-Consul, M. Talmaro. The Queen expressed herself much interested in the ceremony. A large but quiet assemblage came to have a view of her Majesty from the street. The Queen returned to the Chalet des Rosiers at ten at night. On Saturday morning Princess Beatrice went on board the Inflexible, where she was received with naval honours, the crew manning the yards. There was a display of the action of torpedoes in presence of her Royal Highness. Mr. Magnat, the proprietor of the artistic pottery works at Mentone, was received by the Queen, who complimented him upon the productions of his establishment; her Majesty and the Princess making further considerable purchases from him. Prince Henry of Prussia arrived at the Hôtel Bellevue, where he lunched with the Duke of Albany. Their Royal Highnesses afterwards drove out, and also dined together. Prince Henry visited the Queen. Captain Philip Green and the Marchioness Camden were received by her Majesty. Divine service was attended as usual by the Royal family on Easter Day. A fête was given on Monday afternoon on board her Majesty's ship Inflexible, which included dancing, a display of torpedo practice, and other amusements. Many English residents and inhabitants of Mentone were present. The Inflexible was visited by a large number of people during its anchorage off Mentone. Her Majesty and Princess Beatrice went to the Hôtel Bellevue to visit Prince Leopold on Tuesday. His Royal Highness took a trip out to sea in the afternoon on board her Majesty's gun-boat Cygnat. During the last week of the Queen's stay at Mentone her Majesty drove to Bordighera, and in returning visited Dr. Bennet's garden at Grimaldi; and the monastery of Laghetto. The Queen received Drs. Bennet and Siordest and Mr. Hanbury, and Drs. Frank and Bright, of Cannes. Princess Beatrice, accompanied by Lieutenant-General Sir Henry Ponsonby, paid a visit to the Convent of the Annunciation, situated on one of the mountains in the neighbourhood of Mentone. The King and Queen of Saxony and Prince and Princess Philip of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha paid farewell visits to the Royal family. The Queen planted two trees in Mr. Henfrey's grounds to commemorate her visit to the Chalet des Rosiers. Her Majesty and the Princess left Mentone by special train at ten o'clock on Wednesday for Cherbourg, on their return to England.

By order of the Queen, Lord Lyons, English Ambassador in Paris, waited on Madame Christine Nilsson, to express her Majesty's sympathy and condolence with the great prima donna's sad bereavement.

An innovation in the usual Maundy charities has been made this year, and is to be continued. Formerly each Maundy-man received clothing in kind, consisting of three yards of woollen cloth, three ells of linen, one pair of hose or stockings, and one pair of shoes. It being considered that money to the cost of the above would be more beneficial to the recipients, her Majesty, with her usual sympathy with and consideration for the poor and needy, has acceded to this change.

The twenty-ninth anniversary of the birthday of Prince Leopold occurring on Good Friday, the band of the 1st Battalion Grenadier Guards played a selection from oratorios in the court-yard of St. James's Palace. The marriage of his Royal Highness with Princess Helena of Waldeck is fixed for the 27th inst. The Princess, accompanied by the Prince and Princess of Waldeck-Pyrmont, will arrive in England a few days previously. Among the Royal guests invited to attend the marriage at Windsor are the King and Queen of Holland, and the Grand Duke of Hesse-Darmstadt and his daughters.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess, with their daughters, who had left town for the Easter recess, attended Divine service on Good Friday at St. Mary Magdalen's Church, Sandringham Park, the Rector officiating. The Prince left Sandringham the next day for Portsmouth on a visit to Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar and the Countess Dornberg for the Volunteer Review. In the evening his Royal Highness went to a smoking concert given at Southsea by the Minnesingers, an amateur musical club, composed chiefly of officers of both services. On Easter Day the Prince was present at an open-air church parade on the Governor's Green; and subsequently visited the Portsmouth Masonic Club. His Royal Highness, after dining at Eastney Barracks, went to Fort Purbrook to inspect the Artists Corps; and on Monday he was at the Review. On Tuesday the Prince visited the Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar Lodge of Freemasons at Landport, of which his Royal Highness and the Duke of Connaught are honorary members. His Royal Highness afterwards went to the Dockyard, where he was received with Royal salutes, and inspected the turret-ship Colossus, recently launched. He also inspected the Soldiers' Institute, and congratulated Miss Robinson on the success of her self-imposed work. The Prince returned to town in the evening. The Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz and the Duke and Duchess of Teck went to Sandringham on Wednesday on a visit to the Prince and Princess.

During Whitsun week, when his Royal Highness will visit Yarmouth as Honorary Colonel of the Prince of Wales's Norfolk Artillery Militia, the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh will pay a visit to the town in the yacht Lively. The Prince will open the new Townhall, and the Duke of Edinburgh, as Admiral Superintendent of Naval Reserves, will inspect the new coastguard station. Their Royal Highnesses will be the guests of Mr. B. Nightingale, at Shadingfield Lodge.

The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh left Clarence House, St. James's, on Monday for Paris. Their Royal Highness's children went to Cumberland Lodge, Windsor. The Duke, who has been elected a member of the Empire Club, dined there upon the occasion of the dinner given to Rear-Admiral Sir William Hewett, who is about to assume command of the Indian squadron. The Hon. Mrs. Monson has succeeded Lady Emma Osborne as Lady in Waiting to the Duchess.

Hubbard's "Newspaper and Bank Directory of the World," a remarkable publication, purports to give the names of thirty-three thousand newspapers and fifteen thousand banks throughout the globe, combining with this a number of maps and a large amount of gazetteer information. It is published in two volumes, and deserves the claim which it makes of being unique in the nature and extent of its contents.

The Easter banquet at the Mansion House will be given next Monday instead of on Easter Monday. The Lady Mayoress will resume her receptions on Tuesday, April 18, and continue them every Tuesday, from three to five, until further notice. The Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress will entertain the president and members of the Royal Academy at dinner at the Mansion House on June 6. Her Majesty's Judges on June 27; and the Archbishops and Bishops on July 12.

MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT.

The Prime Minister has been wisely preparing for the resumption of his Parliamentary labours on Monday next by a quiet Easter Holiday at Hawarden. Thence brief reports have reached us to the effect that Mr. Gladstone has read the Morning Lessons at church on Good Friday and Easter Sunday. But it may be surmised that since then the Premier has felt some of the "old Adam" within him roused by the speeches of the Conservative leaders in the neighbouring county of Lancashire. Whilst Earl Granville and Sir Charles Dilke have been regarding foreign affairs from their respective retreats at Walmer Castle and at La Sainte Campagne, Toulon, the present and two past Chief Secretaries for Ireland have presumably been putting their heads together at Dublin, and seriously deliberating as to the best way to suppress the sadly increasing lawlessness of the island.

It is simply in consequence of a family bereavement, the death of a nephew in Paris, that Mr. Parnell was on Monday released on parole from Kilmaham to attend the funeral of his relative. Mr. Forster's letter explicitly said the Home Rule and Land League leader was not to engage in any political demonstration; and the hon. member for Cork scrupulously obeyed this injunction by quitting the train with Mr. Justin McCarthy and others on Monday evening at Willeston Junction in lieu of the Euston Terminus, where a large crowd had gathered to greet him. As Mr. Parnell, however, is stated to have informed his colleagues in London that he shared the general feeling of "consternation and horror" with which the "suspects" in Kilmaham regarded the recent agrarian crimes in Ireland, might it not be expedient for the hon. member to convey his sentiments on the matter in the form of a letter to his fellow-countrymen?

Lord Carlingford, installed a Knight of St. Patrick in Dublin on Tuesday, used these grave but hopeful words with regard to Ireland at the banquet which followed the ceremony:—

Never, certainly within my experience (and I might carry the comparison much further back), have the difficulties and dangers of Irish Government been as great as they are to-day. But while I say that and feel it, I feel also that there is no reason to despair. I heartily sympathise with the concluding words of my noble friend the Lord Lieutenant, which combined the sense of heavy responsibility for the peace and safety of the country, and of the arduous nature of that duty, with the resolve to do our best, and not to lose heart in the matter, which ought to animate, and I believe does animate, every member of the Government.

The Conservative chiefs, in their wisdom, place no confidence in the Ministerial panacea for Parliament or for Ireland. Though the political sham fight in Lancashire, where all the fighting was on one side, began with a conciliatory note from Sir Richard Cross, who, at the banquet celebrating the opening of the new Townhall at Bootle on Monday, said he sincerely desired that both sides of the House of Commons should "come to a common agreement" with regard to the removal of existing impediments to legislation, the very next day Sir Stafford Northcote replied to the cheery note of welcome from Ormskirk with this airy reference to the principal Procedure Resolution of the Government:—

I may say, speaking as a member of a House in which liberty of speech is likely very soon to be much curtailed, that it is real pleasure to find oneself amongst an audience who have no idea of the closure.

The Marquis of Salisbury (who was in the same carriage with Sir Stafford Northcote and Sir Richard Cross) alluded in a lighter tone of banter than is common with him to his noble host, of whom he said, "My business in Parliament is principally to obey Lord Lathom." Reserving the sting for the tail of his brief speech, Lord Salisbury characteristically referred to Liberal measures of reform as "those pernicious innovations which have already been foreshadowed and threatened against the Constitution." Similar phrases were manufactured by the noble Marquis, and Party speeches prepared by Sir Stafford Northcote, for the ensuing proceedings in Liverpool, the programme for which comprised laying the corner-stone of the new and handsome Conservative Club in Dale-street on Wednesday, with the inevitable banquet "to follow" at the Philharmonic Hall; a Conference on Thursday morning with the Council of the Constitutional Association at the North-Western Hotel; and a large meeting of the Liverpool Working Men's Associations in the evening at Heugler's Circus, presided over by the Earl of Lathom. Of the minor Conservative stars, Mr. Raikes began shining on Tuesday at the dinner of the Junior Conservative Club of Liverpool.

When to these outpourings of the Opposition vials of wrath against the Government came to be added the vitriolic utterances of Mr. Biggar and Mr. Redmond at Bradford on Tuesday, to some it may have been a relief to turn to the calmer speeches of Mr. Mundella at Sheffield on Monday and Tuesday, of Mr. J. Howard at Luton on Monday, of the Hon. C. R. Spencer and Mr. Buszard at Stamford, of Lord E. Fitzmaurice at Salisbury the same day, and to read Sir Wilfrid Lawson's witty speech at Wigton on Tuesday.

SPRING-TIME.

Youth and Spring—with youthful Love at that tender season of the genial year—seen in perfect harmony amidst the rustic scenery of this agreeable picture. The birches are putting forth their fresh leaflets of the brightest verdure, answering the gentle call of Nature to renew the glories of her summer foliage, while the May-blossoms have already begun to adorn the neighbouring hedge; where this happy young couple are seen loitering on the plank-bridge over a moorland stream, looking down upon the clear water that bathes the roots of trees and fragments of hard rock, but thinking only of one another, and with thoughts which are exceedingly sweet. The girl has filled her hat with spring flowers; and now she finds it a convenient by-play to cast them one by one into the stream, pretending to watch them as they float down, or as they are stopped by the stones; but she is really listening, with her full heart and mind, to the earnest speech of her lover, and she means to give him an answer in her own good time. There is a certain air of decision, tempered with self-respecting reserve, in the countenance of this young lady, which seems to promise that she will not tease him and waste his confidence by any sort of coquetry or feminine finesse. Such is one of the ordinary processes of Nature in Spring-time; and we sincerely hope that both these young persons will find it the prelude to a life of continued and increasing happiness in their mutual affection.

It is announced by the Postmaster-General that the weekly Canadian packets of the direct line, which, during the past winter, have left Liverpool on Wednesdays and Queenstown on Thursdays, are about to their revert to their former arrangement. The packets will again leave Liverpool every Thursday and Londonderry every Friday, and the arrangement will begin with the packet to be dispatched from Liverpool on Thursday, the 20th of this month. From that date, therefore, letters, &c., for Canada intended for conveyance by direct packet should be posted in London in time for the night mail of Thursday, and elsewhere one day later than at present.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

ITALY.

The whole Anglican community in Rome assembled on Sunday afternoon to witness the laying by Sir Augustus Paget, our Ambassador in Rome, of the foundation-stone of All Saints' Church in the Via del Babuino, the destined successor of the English Church on the old Flaminian Way soon to be demolished in the formation of a piazza outside the Porta del Popolo.

An important meeting was held last week in Rome to consider a scheme for the formation of a tunnel under the Straits of Messina, which, it is said, would cost £2,560,000.

The celebration of the Sicilian Vespers passed off quietly, concluding on the 4th inst. with the unveiling of a pyramid erected to commemorate the expedition of Garibaldi in 1860. To this King Humbert was one of the principal contributors. Signor Menotti Garibaldi thanked the spectators, in the name of his father, for this fresh evidence of their sympathy.

SPAIN.

The Councils-General of eleven of the provinces have adopted resolutions in favour of the Franco-Spanish Treaty. The state of siege still exists at Barcelona, but has been raised elsewhere. A naval division and three brigades of troops have arrived at Barcelona, where an anonymous proclamation has been circulated encouraging the tradespeople to persevere in an attitude of defiance.

GERMANY.

The Emperor has thoroughly recovered from his late exhaustion, which was mainly due to the peculiar medical treatment that had become necessary. His Majesty on Monday received Count Hatzfeldt at an audience of considerable duration.

The ceremony of confirming the Princess Victoria, second daughter of the Crown Prince, and Prince Leopold, son of Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia, took place on the 5th inst. at Berlin in the Crown Prince's palace. The solemnity was attended by the German Empress, the Crown Prince and Princess, and all the other members of the German Imperial family except the Emperor, who, although stated to be better, was not well enough to attend the ceremony. The Grand Duke of Hesse, with his two daughters, Princesses Victoria and Elizabeth, who were both confirmed at Darmstadt about two years ago in presence of Queen Victoria, came specially to Berlin to be present at the ceremony.

Herr von Schlözer is officially gazetted as Prussian Minister to the Vatican.

RUSSIA.

After many announcements that Prince Gortschakoff was on the eve of retiring from the direction of the Foreign Affairs of the Empire, the more than octogenarian statesman has tendered his resignation, which has been regretfully but definitely accepted by the Czar; the Prince retaining the nominal dignity of the Chancellorship of the Empire. M. de Giers is appointed his successor.

AMERICA.

President Arthur has vetoed the Chinese Exclusion Bill, considering it undemocratic and hostile to American institutions; and the Senate has failed to pass the bill by a two-thirds majority over the President's veto. But another Chinese Exclusion Bill has been introduced in the Senate, making the term of the suspension of immigration sixteen years. President Arthur has nominated Senator Teller for the post of Secretary of the Interior, and Mr. William E. Chandler for that of Secretary of the Navy. Mr. William Hunt, hitherto holding the office of Secretary of the Navy, is nominated for the post of United States Minister to Russia. Mr. James R. Partridge has been nominated United States Minister to Peru. The Senate has passed the bill for amending the system of counting the Presidential vote. It has also confirmed the nomination of Senator Teller as Secretary of the Interior.

A letter from Mr. Trescott, Special Envoy to Chili, has been published, formally withdrawing any offer of mediation on the part of the United States for arranging the dispute between Chili and Peru.

At a meeting of Irish-Americans held in New York, presided over by the Mayor, who is an Irishman, resolutions were passed urging the President to demand the release of American suspects in Ireland or their prompt trial, and to recall Mr. Lowell, the American Minister in London. The Democratic Times says there is neither sense nor argument in all this rabid talk about the sycophancy of Mr. Lowell, and it adds that the claims made at the meeting on behalf of the Irish-American suspects are incompatible with any sound interpretation of municipal and international law. The Herald condemns the cheap demagogism of the speeches, and sustains the course of the President and Mr. Lowell.

Jumbo arrived at New York on Sunday, and was safely housed in Madison-square Garden before night. The Daily News correspondent says:—

There was unexpected difficulty in dragging Jumbo through the streets last night. Sixteen horses were not strong enough to pull him. Ropes were attached to the car, and hundreds of men pulled on them. Finally Mr. Barnum sent for two of his biggest elephants, which, with the horses, drew him to his quarters, where he arrived at one o'clock in the morning. There was no door large enough to admit the car, so Jumbo stayed out of doors till the morning. The car was backed up to the open door, the boards at the end of the box were removed, and Jumbo was invited to step out. He refused to move, and trumpeted violently his determination to remain. Sent enticed him with buns and hay. Jumbo put forth his foot and hastily withdrew it. He put out his trunk and pounded the ground. After half an hour of enticing he stepped out and entered the gardens, trumpeting and flapping his ears. He was led across the garden and chained in a large pen next to a baby elephant and another. He was welcomed by the other elephants in a grand chorus of trumpeting and by roars from the lions, tigers, hyenas, and other animals. His immense height, towering above everything, made the other elephants look small. Crowds gathered about him. He munched his hay, and appeared as gentle as a child. Chains were put around his legs, and he was led around the amphitheatre while the band played, in order to accustom him to the place. He walked slowly, and twice stopped and endeavoured to lie down. He was not allowed to go near the other elephants for fear of trouble, he was so tired and cross. The garden has been packed to-day with crowds to see him.

Over 15,000 emigrants arrived last week at New York, about two thirds being Germans.

A disastrous cyclone has visited Kansas, and nearly demolished a small town. Four persons were killed on the spot, and all the other inhabitants were more or less injured. Another hurricane, which occurred in Michigan, destroyed a great deal of property, and killed several persons.

The boiler of a river steamer exploded in Wisconsin, killing six of the crew and wounding eleven. No passengers were on board.

CANADA.

The Marquis of Lorne arrived at Montreal on the 12th inst. from Niagara. Festivities on a brilliant scale were organised in honour of his Excellency's visit.

In a sitting of the Dominion House of Commons a motion declaring the existing sugar duties to be excessive has been lost by 85 against 36 votes.

The Dominion has a surplus on the nine months, ending 1st ult., of 6,000,000 dollars.

The bill legalising marriage with a deceased wife's sister has been read the second time in the Ottawa Senate.

Mr. Adams, the Surveyor-General of New Brunswick, has tendered his resignation, in consequence, it is stated, of differences with the Premier, the Hon. J. Fraser, concerning a private bill passed by the Legislative Assembly.

The recent deadlock in the British Columbia Legislative Assembly has been broken by one of the Opposition members voting against the motion brought forward expressing want of confidence in the Ministry. The business of the House is now expected to proceed regularly.

Two steam-ships, with 3000 Chinese emigrants on board, sailed from Hong-Kong on Monday week for Victoria, Vancouver Island. They are to be employed on the Canadian and Pacific Railway.

NEW ZEALAND.

The Ministry has resigned, in consequence of the illness of the Premier, the Hon. John Hall.

The Hon. Sir Arthur Gordon, the Governor, has opened an international exhibition in Christchurch, which promises to be a complete success.

The fund for the relief of the persecuted Russian Jews now amounts to over £65,000.

Six Circassian officers have been arrested on the charge of attempting to assassinate Arabi Pasha, the Egyptian Minister of War and Marine.

Another revolution is reported from Hayti. It was directed against President Salomon, who has proclaimed martial law, and was preparing to march upon the disturbed districts with 3000 men.

The ship Samuel Plimsoll, 1444 tons, Captain Boaden, chartered by Mr. Saul Samuel, C.M.G., Agent-General for New South Wales, has sailed from Plymouth for Sydney, with 405 emigrants, under the supervision of Dr. G. S. Eadson, as Surgeon-Superintendent, with Mrs. Eager in charge of the single women.

The transit of Venus, which is to take place on Dec. 6 next, and thereafter will not recur for 122 years—that is to say, until June 7, 2004—will be observed on behalf of the French Government by eight missions—four in the northern, and four in the southern hemisphere. There will be stations in the West Indies, Patagonia, Chili, Florida, and Mexico. Preliminary measures are already being taken at the Paris Observatory by the chiefs of the missions.

A novel kind of exhibition is now open in Dresden. It is a collection of newspapers and magazines of all countries. The exhibits comprise more than 1500 periodicals, printed in fifty-five different languages. There are 291 in German, 124 in English, 154 in the Latin languages (French, Italian, &c.), 34 in Slav dialects, 7 in Finnish, and 75 in Asiatic tongues and others. Amongst them are 99 illustrated periodicals, 60 comic papers, and 592 scientific and industrial publications.

An occasional correspondent at Burmah writes by the last mail:—"The King has at last thought proper to dispatch an Ambassador and suite to Calcutta, there to discuss with the authorities the objectionable tariff of duties that have long hampered trade. In the meantime, the Indian Government has taken the bull by the horns and boldly abolished throughout British Burmah the whole of the customs duties, with the exception of those levied on liquor, arms, and salt, so that Burmah has virtually reached the ideal free trade policy of a Liberal Government at home. The Viceroy has likewise signified his desire to have a High Court of Justice established, and which, it is acknowledged on all hands, is so much wanted in Burmah, if only to control inferior tribunals. This lesser India of ours is growing rapidly in wealth and importance, and can no longer think of submitting to a slovenly and often unsatisfactory administration of justice. It is quite time to consider whether something cannot be done to restrain the too-frequent infliction of capital punishment upon a Buddhist people who hold to the sacredness of human life as an article of the deepest religious faith and feeling."

THE SPRING ASSIZES.

The following is a complete list of the dates fixed by the Judges for holding the Spring Assizes:—

South-Eastern Circuit (Mr. Baron Pollock)—Hertford, Tuesday, April 18; Lewes, Friday, April 21; Cambridge, Tuesday, May 2; Ipswich, Thursday, May 4.

Oxford Circuit (Mr. Baron Huddleston)—Reading, Tuesday, April 18; Worcester, Saturday, April 22; Stafford, Friday, April 28.

Western Circuit (Mr. Justice Hawkins)—Taunton, Tuesday, April 18; Exeter, Monday, April 24; Winchester, Tuesday, May 16.

Midland Circuit (Mr. Justice Stephen)—Lincoln, Tuesday, April 18; Northampton, Monday, April 24; Derby, Saturday, April 29; Warwick, Friday, May 5.

North-Eastern Circuit (Mr. Justice Bowen and Mr. Justice Watkin Williams)—Newcastle, Thursday, April 20; Durham, Monday, April 24; Leeds, Monday, May 1. Mr. Justice Bowen will not join the circuit until Leeds is reached.

Northern Circuit (Mr. Justice Mathew and Mr. Justice Cave)—Carlisle, Tuesday, April 18; Manchester, Thursday, April 20; Liverpool, Tuesday, May 2.

North and South Wales Circuits (Mr. Justice Chitty)—Ruthin, Tuesday, April 18; Chester, Friday, April 21; Swansea, Thursday, April 27.

Prisoners only will be tried at these assizes, except at Manchester, Liverpool, and Leeds, at which three places civil as well as criminal business will be taken.

At a meeting last week of the Anthropological Institute (Major-General Pitt-Rivers, F.R.S., president, in the chair) the election of Everard F. im. Thurn, Esq., was announced. The president exhibited some masks and wood carvings from New Ireland; Mr. C. Stamland Wake read a paper on the Papuans and the Polynesians; and a paper was read by Mr. C. Pfoundes on Rites and Customs in Old Japan.

A party of children, fifty girls and five boys, left the St. Pancras station of the Midland Railway last week for the purpose of sailing in the steam-ship Parisian, belonging to the Allan Line, from Liverpool for Canada. The girls all came from Miss Rye's Emigration Home at Peckham, where they had been for at least two months, their ages ranging between nine and fourteen, and all who are old enough are intended for immediate domestic service, while the little ones will be candidates for adoption. After arrival in Canada, all the girls will be taken by Mrs. Rogers, who goes out with them as matron, to Miss Rye's Home at Niagara, where they will be received by that lady herself, and dealt with as may seem most desirable. The boys, who came from Bath and Suffolk, being from six to ten years old, will first be taken to Miss Bilborough's Home at Marchmont, Canada; both boys and girls are either orphans or destitute children who were for the most part quite friendless before they were taken in hand by those who are now sending them to the Dominion of Canada. As far as Liverpool the little band were accompanied by Miss Bessie Rye. The children had a carriage to themselves, four compartments being occupied by the girls, and one by the boys, and as the train was starting they gave several hearty hurrahs.

The restoration of Tring church, begun twenty years ago, is completed. The total cost has amounted to nearly £10,000.

The Church of St. John the Evangelist, Cowley, is about to be completed by the erection of the nave, which is designed to accommodate 730 persons.

A new church has been consecrated at Baylan, Glamorgan-shire, which has been erected through the liberality of Mr. G. Llewellyn, of Baylan Hall.

A handsome reredos in English oak, designed by Mr. J. Oldrid Scott, has been erected in Bangor Cathedral, at the expense of Mrs. Symes.

Mr. Edward C. Baring, of Membland Hall, Devon, is erecting a handsome new church at Noss Mayo, on the Revelstoke side of the charming combe through which the river Yealm wanders.

A detailed account of the bells in all the old parish churches of Gloucestershire, their founders, inscriptions, &c., with more than one hundred illustrations, will shortly be published by the Rev. H. N. Ellacombe, F.S.A.

Mr. John Blockley has been presented with a handsome testimonial by the clergy and congregation of St. Saviour's, Haverstock-hill, where he has officiated as organist for a period of thirty-three years.

After a restoration, carried out chiefly at the cost of the Marquis of Londonderry, Sir W. W. Wynn, Bart., M.P., and other landed proprietors, the parish church of Llanidloes, believed to be one of the oldest in the diocese, was reopened on Tuesday. The Bishop preached.

The Bishop of London has admitted two ladies to the order of deaconesses, in the chapel of the London Diocesan Deaconess Institution at Westbourne Park. The newly admitted deaconesses will be engaged in general parochial work. It is understood that there is a very increasing demand among the clergy for the services of these trained ladies.

It has been resolved by the Dean and Chapter of Westminster to carry out the wishes of the late Dean, who left £3000 towards giving free admission to all parts of the abbey, by admitting the public free on Tuesdays as well as on Mondays, which are already free. The giving free admission on this one day in the week will, it is calculated, entail a loss of some £120 a year to the fund obtained from admissions.

The rebuilding and extension of the chancel of the fine old parish church of Great Grimsby, as a memorial to Canon Ainslie, lately resigned, but for many years Vicar, is about to be commenced. During Mr. Ainslie's incumbency the nave was newly roofed and the western gable rebuilt, under the direction of Mr. Withers, who also designed the new east end.

It has been found necessary to re-roof the nave of the parish church of Shipdam, Norfolk, and it has been resolved at the same time to restore and reseal the interior. The cost is estimated at £2500, towards which the Rector (the Rev. G. C. Bailey) has contributed £1000, and promises of further aid to the extent of £300 have been obtained. As the population of the parish is chiefly of the labouring class, but little further help can be hoped for locally, and the assistance of the wealthy community outside is solicited.

The Church Missionary Society has offered to contribute £500 per annum towards the support of a Church of England Bishop of Japan, and a similar sum is to be contributed by the Society for Propagating the Gospel. The Record states that a very old friend of the Church Missionary Society, an earnest upholder of its principles, has offered, as a mark of his thorough approval of the action of the society regarding the Japan bishopric, to guarantee the contribution to the society's funds of £500 per annum for the first five years, on the understanding that the society's conditions regarding it are fulfilled. Their promised grant is thus provided without drawing on the general contributions to their funds.

The usual services will be held in the nave of Westminster Abbey at seven p.m. on Sunday evenings from the first Sunday after Easter till the end of July. The public will be admitted by the west door at 6.30 p.m. A limited number of seats will be reserved for the use of the families and guests of the Dean and Chapter, and of persons officially or otherwise connected with the Abbey, or resident within its precincts, of members of either House of Parliament, and of occasional visitors from our colonies or America. All other seats and all reserved seats unoccupied at seven p.m. will be open to the public; and the issue of tickets entitling the holders to reserved places, with the exceptions above named, will henceforth be discontinued.

A private bill has been brought into the House of Commons to increase the income of the bishopric of Liverpool by authorising the trustees of the Episcopal Fund to buy the advowson of the vicarage of Walton-on-the-Hill, to which parish Liverpool once belonged, with a view to the vicarage being extinguished at the next avoidance. There is now both a Rector and Vicar, and this scheme hands the spiritual care of the parishioners over to the Rector alone. As the result of this financial transaction, it is stated that £450 a year will be added to the bishopric; the Rector will also have a share of the proceeds, some portion of which will, it is stated, be applied for the spiritual benefit of the inhabitants. The bill is down for a second reading on April 17.

The trustees of the late Mr. E. R. Harris, prothonotary of Lancashire, have decided to make the following grants to churches out of the £5000 set apart for that purpose:—£3000 to St. George's, Preston; £1000 to St. Matthew's, Preston; £500 to Longridge church; £500 to St. Stephen's, Preston; and £250 to St. Mark's, Preston. They have also approved plans for a new orphanage to be built and endowed near Preston out of funds left by the same testator. The building is to accommodate 150 orphans, and will cost £25,000. The endowment fund will bring the actual cost up to £74,000. Under the same trust a technical school for Preston will be established, and a new free library and museum erected. The foundation-stone of the museum and library will, it is expected, be laid by the Prince of Wales at the Guild Festival in the first week in September. The sites for the buildings are provided for the trustees, as required under the will.

The Dean of Westminster has stated that about £4000 has been subscribed in this country to the Dean Stanley Memorial Fund, and a sum of £1064 has come from the United States. American subscribers, numbering 300, stipulate that their subscriptions should be applied to pay for one of the memorial windows in the restored Chapter House of Westminster Abbey, with a suitable inscription. The Dean states that of the total subscription it is believed that 2000 guineas, a larger sum than was at first expected, may be required for the monument in the Abbey, a small model of which—a recumbent figure supported on a tomb—has been prepared by Mr. Boehm. "The sum that remains will, after deducting necessary expenses, be barely sufficient to defray the cost of two of the three large and one small windows which will remain after the completion of those which will be given by her Majesty, by the late Dean himself, and by the American contributors. It is hoped, therefore, that the sum necessary for the entire completion of the work—about £1500 more—may yet be raised by the admirers of one whose loss is still so deeply felt."

It is proposed to erect a memorial window in St. Giles's Cathedral, Edinburgh, to the late Dean Stanley, as a tribute from his friends and admirers in Scotland. Subscriptions are being collected throughout the Scotch Church. The Established Church Presbytery at Aberdeen have resolved to lay the matter before the Synod next week.—Two two-light windows have been inserted at the west end of the parish church of Radwinter, near Saffron Walden. They are from the studio of Messrs. Gibbs and Howard, and illustrate by means of four subjects in each window Baptism and the Holy Eucharist. Much care was bestowed upon the arrangement of the design by the Vicar, the Rev. J. F. W. Bullock.—A handsome stained-glass window has recently been erected at St. Bartholomew's, Ripponden, bearing the following inscription:—"To the glory of God, and in loving memory of Sarah Elizabeth, wife of the Rev. Joseph Gledhill, Vicar of this parish, who fell asleep on Jan. 18, 1879, this window is erected by her husband." The work was designed and executed by Heaton, Butler, and Bayne.—The window by Taylor, of Berners-street, which has been inserted at the Priory Church, Brecon, in memory of the men of the 24th Regiment who fell in the South African campaign, was unveiled on the 13th inst.—It is stated that the memorial to the 66th (Berkshire) Regiment is to take the form of a painted window in St. Mary's Church, Reading, where the old colours of the 66th hang. It has also been decided to erect a monument, in the shape of a colossal lion, in the Forbury Gardens.

ART NOTES.

The Exhibition of the Institute of Painters in Water Colours will be opened next Monday.

The Exhibition of the Incorporated Society of British Artists in Suffolk-street was open free on Monday.

Mr. William Rathjens, a distinguished member of the Manchester Academy of Fine Arts, died at Jersey last week at the age of forty.

Mr. W. Fettes Douglas, R.S.A., has resigned his position of Curator of the Edinburgh National Gallery, in consequence of his appointment to the Presidency of the Academy.

An artistic county bazaar, in aid of the building fund of the Lancashire Independent College, is to be held at the St. James's Hall, Manchester, during the month of May.

An exhibition of drawings sent in competition for the medals and certificates of the Coachmakers' Company, also of drawings sent in competition for prizes by students of St. Mark's Drawing and Technical School for Coach Workmen and Apprentices, was held at the Mansion House on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday; on the last day the prizes being distributed by the Lord Mayor.

The Earl of Rosebery last week unveiled a marble statue of the poet Burns at Dumfries, in presence of an immense gathering. His Lordship referred in glowing terms to the poems of Burns. Lord Young presided at the banquet subsequent to the unveiling of the statue, and remarked in the course of his speech that there was no better name to conjure with in Scotland than that of Burns.

A meeting of the committee to consider the erection of a memorial to the late Mr. G. E. Street, R.A., was held last week in the new Law Courts, Mr. A. Beresford-Hope in the chair. The Prince of Wales moved the first resolution, which was to the effect that the memorial should be a full-length figure of the late architect, and should be placed in the central hall of the new Law Courts. It was unanimously agreed to, Mr. Armistead, R.A., being appointed to carry out the work. Sir F. Leighton and Mr. Shaw-Lefevre spoke.

A memorial statuette of the Earl of Beaconsfield has been placed next to that of William Hogarth in the entrance-hall of the National Portrait Gallery, Exhibition-road, South Kensington. It is cast in bronze and inclosed within a glass case. The late Premier of England is represented seated in an easy-chair with his arms folded and his legs crossed as if in meditation. On the pedestal is the following inscription in black letters:—"Benjamin Disraeli, Earl of Beaconsfield and Viscount Hughenden, K.G.; born Dec. 21, 1804; died April 19, 1881; modelled in Paris, 1878-9, and presented to the National Portrait Gallery February, 1882, by the Lord Ronald Gower, F.S.A."

The Executive Committee of the International Fisheries Exhibition, to be held in London, have unanimously elected Sir B. I. Brandreth Gibbs as the director and secretary of this gathering, to take place next year.

The Metropolitan Police, with a view of preventing charitable persons from being imposed upon, have circulated the description of a woman who feigns having fits on the doorsteps of dwelling-houses in good neighbourhoods, and, after receiving attention, tells her sympathisers a pitiful tale to the effect that her husband had recently been killed, or either found dead in bed, causing her a severe illness, and that she has just wandered out to find work to support her young family, who are now in a destitute condition. The description of this impostor is:—Aged twenty-seven; height, 5 ft. 7 in.; complexion, very pale; dressed in light grey ulster and black bonnet.

BENEVOLENCE AND SELF-HELP.

A bazaar in aid of the Sea Shell Mission will be held at the Hanover Rooms, Kennington, on the 25th inst. and three following days.

The quarterly court of subscribers to the Royal Masonic Institution for Girls found themselves last Saturday in the satisfactory position of being enabled to dispense with an election by admitting all the candidates, thus raising the number in the school to 235.

Police-Constable Bartels was handed by Sir James Ingham last Saturday a cheque for £10 from the Police Reward Fund for his bravery, on the 22nd ult., in penetrating into a house on fire in Hammersmith, from which he rescued an old lady, an elderly gentleman, and three young girls.

On Tuesday the jubilee of the Warneford Hospital was celebrated at Leamington by a special service in the chapel, when Archdeacon Holbeche gave an address, followed by a public luncheon, over which Lord Percy presided. Lord and Lady Leigh, the Hon. Gilbert Leigh, Sir John Eardley Wilmot, and Lady Bertie Percy were amongst those present.

It is intended to hold a bazaar, under the patronage of the Princess of Wales, on June 14 and 15 in aid of the Association for the Relief of Ladies in Distress from Non-payment of Rent in Ireland. The Duchess of Teck has promised to be one of the stall-holders. The main object of this bazaar is to find a sale for the work done by some of the ladies, who prefer disposing of their work to receiving aid in any other way.

A special meeting was held at the Wolverhampton and Staffordshire Hospital, Wolverhampton, last week, for the purpose of ventilating a scheme for the erection of a convalescent home for patients, as a memorial to the late Mr. Henry Rogers. A letter was read from Mr. W. H. Rogers, brother of the deceased, promising a donation of £1000 and an annual subscription of fifteen guineas. Several other large money-gifts were announced, and a committee was formed to carry out the project.

A meeting of the Mansion House committee of the fund for the relief of the sufferers by the anti-Jewish riots in Russia was held yesterday week—the Lord Mayor presiding. It was reported that the fund amounted to £66,000; and it was resolved to ascertain to what extent regular reports could be had with regard to the emigrants after their arrival, before paying over the £5000 which was to be allocated to a fund for aiding their settlement at the other side of the Atlantic. Mr. S. Montagu was appointed to act with Mr. Lawrence Oliphant.

The Blue Ribbon Temperance Army held their annual meeting at Exeter Hall on Monday—Mr. W. W. Noble, the founder of the army, in the chair. He referred to the great success that had attended the movement, and said that as they had incurred an outlay of £1000 in enlarging their quarters at Hoxton, increased pecuniary support ought not to be wanted, as the army had now 200,000 members.—Earl Cairns presided in the evening at a crowded mass meeting at Bournemouth, in connection with the Blue Ribbon Army, and dwelt at some length on the dreadful evil of intemperance.

The Thirtieth Annual Session of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars began on Monday at York. The first report of the credential committee showed the attendance at the opening sitting was four hundred from all parts of the country, of whom nearly half had newly become members of the Grand Lodge. At subsequent sittings the Grand Secretary reported a membership of over 91,000, and over 50,000 juvenile Templars in addition. Deputations were received and addresses presented from every temperance organisation in York, including the United Kingdom Alliance and the newly-formed Yorkshire Sunday Closing Association.

At the invitation of the Lord Mayor, a meeting was held at the Mansion House last week with a view to taking steps to raise a fund for assisting a selected number of unemployed working men to emigrate to Canada. The gathering was addressed by Sir Alexander Galt, Mr. Alderman McArthur, M.P., Mr. Torrens, M.P., and other speakers. Sir A. Galt said the Canadian Government had offered to give £1 per head for a certain number of families for whom the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had offered to find employment. It was explained that £6000 were required to start the scheme, and it was resolved to form a committee and open a subscription.

The anniversary festival of the Asylum for Fatherless Children was held last week at Cannon-street Hotel; Mr. John Kemp Welch in the chair. The object of the charity is to provide for children who have lost their father, and whose surviving parent is unable to maintain them, and candidates are eligible between the ages of three months and eleven years. The annual expenditure is £8000, of which regular subscriptions produce £2500, and an infirmary is now being built at a cost of £5000, for which funds are urgently needed. There are over 300 children in the institution. Subscriptions to the amount of nearly £1500, including 100 guineas from the chairman, were announced.

The annual conference of the members of the National Union of Elementary Teachers has been held this week at Sheffield. The sittings began on Monday and ended on Thursday, the remainder of the week being devoted to excursions to places of interest in the neighbourhood and to visits to works. The Union is an associated body, representing schoolmasters, schoolmistresses, and elementary teachers throughout the United Kingdom. There are 321 local associations in connection with it. Mr. Mundella, M.P., was present on Tuesday afternoon at the opening, by Miss Mundella, of an "Old English Fancie Fayre," in aid of the benevolent funds of the union. At the conference dinner in the evening Mr. Mundella said the annual expenditure of his department must increase, and he meant to promote such increase. "The department was at present reorganising the inspectorate. He considered that we are only at the beginning of our educational system; and that the time must come soon when middle-class education must be properly provided for."

The fifth annual exhibition of works of industry and art, contributed by the teachers and scholars in twelve of the principal Sunday Schools in the Battersea district, was opened on Monday in the Mantua-street Board School, the use of which had been granted by the School Board for London, the chairman of which is president of the society. The exhibits are, as on previous occasions, of a numerous and interesting character, divided into nineteen classes, open to both girls and boys, and embracing specimens of their handiwork in wood turning, carving, joinery, clay modelling, tin-plate work, models of all kinds, knitting, embroidery, cookery, drawing, painting, mapping, and various other branches of industry, the whole being arranged in a most effective manner. The class list comprises some 250 sections, in each of which prizes are offered. The opening ceremony was performed by Mr. James Bailey, Head Master of Southlands, in the presence of a numerous audience, to whom he spoke on the subject of Sunday Schools and the good work which had grown out of them, far beyond what had been anticipated by those who originally founded them.

OLIVE GATHERING AT MENTONE IN APRIL.

OLIVE-GATHERING AT MENTONE.

In connection with the recent sojourn of the Queen and Princess Beatrice at Mentone, our sketch of the olive-gathering scene in that neighbourhood may have some interest for home readers. "The olive-tree," says Dr. Henry Bennet, "is the real lord of the Mentonian amphitheatre, covering the lower hills and the base of the higher, to a height of about 2000 ft. above the level of the sea. In the South of France, the olive-tree, however fertile, is a miserable object; it is generally treated as a pollard, is small and dwarfish, and looks much like a mutilated dust-covered willow. As soon, however, as the Esterel mountains are passed, and Cannes is reached, we enter on a different climate, more protected in winter, and more suited to its growth. It is allowed to grow as a forest-tree, and at once assumes a dignity and grandeur which quite surprises those who have only seen the stunted specimens of 'la belle Provence.' The longevity of the olive-tree, in a congenial climate like that of Mentone, may be said to be indefinite. There are olive-trees still alive at Monaco, at Cape Martin, and elsewhere, which are supposed to be coeval with the Roman Empire.

"It is a slow-growing tree, and when, after several hundred years, the trunk decays, the bark remains alive. As the decay progresses the tree splits as it were into two, three, or more sections. The bark twists and curls round each of these decayed sections, and unites on the other side. Thus, instead of the old tree, we have two, three, or more apparently separate, though in reality all growing from the same root. When these in turn die, new shoots spring up from the old roots, and so the life of the tree is indefinitely prolonged. All the stages of growth above described may be witnessed within the space of a few yards; and the partially decayed, partially split, gnarled, twisted, curved trunks are picturesque in the extreme.

"The healthy full-grown olive-tree is really very beautiful. It is often as large as a fine old oak, but with fewer limbs and more sparse foliage. In the variety of the olive-tree usually cultivated on the Riviera, the terminal extremity of the branches hangs down; and to some, who have sadness in their hearts, the dense masses of these sombre grey trees, with drooping foliage, may give a sorrowful, mournful character to the landscape. But to others, the play of the wind, with that of the sunlight, on the ever-moving pendulous dark green leaves, especially when seen in masses from a height above, is soothing as well as beautiful.

"I never fully appreciated the beauty of the olive-tree, although I had seen it in its glory in Southern Italy, until I had passed a winter under the shadow of an olive-clad mountain at Mentone. The fact is that the olive-tree, like our own evergreen spruce and Scotch fir, is much more beautiful in autumn and winter than in summer. In spring, the new leaves of the evergreen tree form, in summer and autumn it throws off its old worn-out damaged garments, and when winter comes, it is again clothed in the grace and beauty of early youth. The olive-tree flowers in April, and bears every year.

"The olive-berry ripens in the autumn; it becomes black, and begins to fall off the tree in December and January. Some of the trees are at once cleared by beating the branches with long canes. In that case the oil is not so abundant, but is of better quality. In other cases, the berries are left on the tree, for two or three months longer; until, indeed, they nearly all fall off. The oil made from these berries is more abundant, but not so good. Picking the olive-berries from the ground underneath the trees is quite an occupation with old or infirm women, and with young girls. The berries, when gathered, are taken to the olive-mills, where they are crushed, and the oil is extracted."

BITS OF OLD LONDON.

Half-way up Ludgate-hill on the left-hand side, a little above the Old Bailey, stands St. Martin's Church, which is on the site of the ancient Ludgate. On the opposite or south side of the street, towards the Thames, are St. Martin's-court and Pilgrim-street, both leading to the flag-paved area called Broadway, where Messrs. George Routledge and Sons, the well-known publishers, have their local habitation. The back street below St. Martin's-court runs down to New Bridge-street, Blackfriars, on the north side of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Terminus. It is now being widened, for which purpose it has been requisite to demolish several curious old houses, the Blue Last public-house and those adjacent, and to remove a piece of the old City Wall, which formerly inclosed the south side of Ludgate-hill down to the Fleet River (afterwards Fleet Ditch), then flowing along what is now the busy thoroughfare of New Bridge-street. No. 1 of our Illustrations, on the preceding page, shows the appearance of this fine specimen of old English urban fortification, as it was two or three weeks ago; but two or three days ago there was only a thin strip of it left, sticking to the back of the house, a restaurant, at the corner of St. Martin's-court, directly opposite the "Blue Last." Another piece of it, lower down the hill, was removed some years ago to make room for the back warehouse of Messrs. Trübner and Co., the publishers. This wall, which was nine feet thick, was built of rough unhewn stones, with a great abundance of hard cement; and the workmen find it no easy task, with wedges and sledge-hammers, to destroy such durable masonry, scarcely inferior to that of the Romans. It is six hundred years old, having been constructed about 1274, in the reign of King Edward I., as we read in Lambert's History of London:—"In this year, Robert Kilwarby, Archbishop of Canterbury, by license from the Crown, founded the Convent of Blackfriars, which was built with the stones taken out of the ruins of the Tower of Montfichet, and from a part of the City wall, pulled down to make way for the building. This produced an order from the King to the citizens of London to build a new wall, with a tower at the head of it for his reception; which wall was to run from Ludgate westward, behind the houses, to Fleet Ditch, and thence southward to the River Thames. For the completing of which new work his Majesty granted the City a duty on sundry merchandises, for the term of three years." Just above St. Martin's-court in Pilgrim-street is a small one-storeyed building, of semi-circular shape, partly occupied by the shop of a news-vender and tobacconist, partly by an oyster-bar. This stands on the site of the ancient "lock-up," or cell connected with the watch-house at Ludgate; and the tower was probably a few yards higher up Pilgrim-street, where the street bends at a right angle to enter Ludgate-hill. A stone belonging to the old tower, which protected the south flank of Ludgate when the City of London was fortified, may still be examined.

Mr. J. Howard, M.P., opened a Domestic and Scientific Exhibition on Monday at Luton.

Mr. W. Jackson, Mayor of Grimsby, has received, through the Foreign Office, a binocular-glass in a polished ebony casket, which has been awarded by the Emperor of Germany to Mr. Alfred Naulls, late master of the fishing-smack Livingstone, of that port, in acknowledgment of his gallant services to the shipwrecked crew of the German schooner Alida, in December last.

The weekly returns of metropolitan pauperism show that in the last week of March there were 92,233 paupers, of whom 51,480 were indoor, and 40,753 outdoor. This shows a decrease of 3490 as compared with the corresponding week of 1881. The vagrants relieved on the last day of the last week of March numbered 788, of whom 601 were men, 152 women, and 35 children under sixteen years of age.

The library of the late Mr. Ouvry, F.S.A., sold last week by Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson, and Hodge, was well known as containing many of the old ballads and broadsides, with some editions of the Early English dramatists, and a remarkable collection of the various editions of Shakespeare, both original and of the costly reprints made under the superintendence of Mr. Halliwell Phillips, the distinguished Shakespearean. The letters of Charles Dickens and many literary contemporaries to him were an interesting feature in the sale. The prices obtained were very high, and the six days' sale, of 1628 lots, realised £6169.

GENERAL HOME NEWS.

Mr. Bright will give an address at the opening of the new Reference Library at Birmingham on May 1 next.

Mr. B. V. Winch has been elected commodore of the Norfolk and Suffolk Yacht Club for 1882.

The state apartments of Windsor Castle, which were open to the public on Monday, are closed until further orders.

Sir Fowell Buxton and some of his friends are about to take several Norfolk farmers to Holland for an agricultural tour.

Sir John Pope Hennessy, Governor of Hong-Kong, arrived in England by Tuesday's mail.

The concerts announced to take place at the Royal Victoria Coffee Hall on Mondays and Thursdays in April and May promise to be very attractive.

The fiftieth annual (jubilee) meeting of the British Medical Association will be held at Worcester on Aug. 8 and three following days.

All the defendants charged in connection with the alleged prize-fight in St. Andrew's Hall have been committed for trial at the Middlesex Sessions.

Mr. Simmonds, who made an attempt on Monday to cross the Bristol Channel in a balloon, but met with contrary winds, descended at Swimbridge, after having been up three hours.

Messrs. Longman and Co. have published in their Sunbeam Series a popular edition of "The Arctic Regions," extracted from "The Polar World," by Dr. G. Hartwig.

Mr. William Cockerell, of Cambridge, barrister-at-law, of the South-Eastern Circuit, has been appointed Recorder of Sudbury, Suffolk, vacant by the death of Mr. T. H. Naylor.

A pension has been granted to a Scottish Volunteer for the loss of an eye through an accident at the Edinburgh Review of last August.

An International Fisheries Exhibition, opened in Edinburgh on Wednesday, bids fair to be an important display in connection with fisheries and pisciculture.

The ceremony of unveiling the memorial to the officers and soldiers of the 24th Regiment who fell in the South African campaigns of 1877-8-9, took place at Brecon on Thursday.

The "Royal Navy List" for April, 1882, edited by Lieut.-Colonel F. Lean, contains a record of the war services of naval officers, a list of the civil appointments held by retired officers, and other matters of interest.

Nine men and a boy were entombed at Killingworth Colliery, near Newcastle, on Wednesday week, by a portion of the shaft giving way. An attempt to reach them through another shaft failed; but at midnight they were all rescued.

The Commander-in-Chief has requested that Lieutenants E. A. Waller and G. F. Jones, R.E., may be informed of his very high appreciation of their services in Candahar while that place was invested by Ayoub Khan.

A handsome Townhall for the populous borough of Bootle, formerly a suburb of Liverpool, was opened on Monday. In the evening a banquet was given in the Townhall by the Mayor, at which a large gathering took place.

The memorial-stones of a new Townhall, which will, when completed, be presented to the town of Haverhill, Suffolk, by Mr. Daniel Gurteen, of that place, were laid on Tuesday. The hall will cost about £5000, including the site.

The first eighty-ton gun was successfully lowered into the turret at Dover on the 6th inst. The work of lifting it from the glacis of the fort, and of moving it over the turret, occupied a party of Royal Artillery four days.

The Earl of Rosebery has bought the Maleny estate, about six miles from Edinburgh, for £125,000. The estate consists of 2972 Imperial acres, including 2127 of arable, 630 of hill pasture, and 190 of woodland and plantations. The net rental is stated to be £14,351.

The arrivals of live stock and fresh meat at Liverpool from the United States and Canada last week show a decrease in both live cattle and fresh meat, and as regards sheep and hogs there were again no arrivals: the total being 206 cattle, 6566 quarters of beef, and 1843 carcasses of mutton.

An exhibition of appliances employed in connection with naval and submarine engineering was opened on Monday at the Agricultural Hall, Islington, to remain open for ten days. There are between 500 and 600 exhibitors, among whom are some of the best-known engineering firms.

Sir Edward Watkin, accompanied by several gentlemen, visited the works of the Channel Tunnel near Calais on Monday, which extend for some 300 feet eastward of the shaft at Sangatte; and on Tuesday the party visited the works at Shakespeare Cliff.

On Tuesday the boys of Christ's Hospital attended at the Mansion House and received their usual Easter gifts from the Lord Mayor. Subsequently the civic authorities proceeded in state to Christ Church, Newgate-street, where the annual sermon was preached by the Bishop of St. Asaph.

On Tuesday evening the possibility of lighting both our streets and houses on the incandescent system by electricity from a centre supplying a circle of about a mile in diameter was satisfactorily demonstrated at Holborn Viaduct and neighbourhood. The experiments were on the Edison system.

At the meeting of the Metropolitan Board of Works last week nineteen tenders were opened for constructing a bridge over the Thames at Putney. The amounts ranged from £360,000 to £240,000, the tender for the last mentioned sum being accepted.

A disagreeable incident of the observance of Good Friday is reported from Inverness, where considerably more than 100 persons suffered from symptoms of poisoning through eating hot-cross buns bought at the same shop. No deaths have, however, been reported.

We learn from the City Press that Mr. Horace Jones, the City architect, has been instructed to prepare plans for an obelisk out of the materials of old Temple Bar, to be erected in Epping Forest. The precise locality has not yet been fixed upon, but it will probably be the spot made most memorable by the visit of her Majesty to the Forest next month.

The Metropolitan Railway directors have abolished the vexatious distinction between third-class and Parliamentary fares which has puzzled the brains and tried the temper of so many travellers. Henceforth all third-class fares are Parliamentary—that is, at the rate of a penny a mile.

For the University L.L.A. examination for ladies at St. Andrew's University, 254 candidates have entered their names this year, as against 175 in 1881. In addition to the four former centres—St. Andrew's, London, Halifax, and Bristol—two others have been instituted—Edinburgh and Aberdeen.

Mr. Gladstone, who is spending a quiet holiday at Hawarden, attended Divine service in the parish church and read the Lessons on both Good Friday and Easter Day. Large congregations attended these services. The prayers were said by the Rector, the Rev. Stephen Gladstone; the Lessons were read most impressively by the Premier; and the Rev. W. Henry Cooper was celebrant and preacher.

A circular has been issued to the solvent shareholders of the City of Glasgow Bank proposing they should form a company to take over the assets of the bank, and raise money to enable the liquidators to pay this year the remaining liabilities, amounting to £1,000,361. This scheme will prevent these valuable assets being realised just now at a loss.

The usual fortnightly meeting of the Fruit and Floral Committee of the Royal Horticultural Society was held on Tuesday in the gardens, South Kensington, which are now looking lovely in their early spring dress of delicate green. Visitors were numerous in the conservatory, which Mr. A. F. Barron had made gay with all the natural and forced flowers of the season.

A conversazione was given at the Smoke Abatement Exhibition at Manchester on the 6th inst. The Mayors and chief members of the corporations and medical officers of health of Manchester, Salford, Oldham, and professors of Owens College and scientific societies were present, as well as Mr. Benjamin Armitage, M.P., and a large number of influential citizens of Manchester, Salford, and the surrounding towns. A short address was given by the Mayor of Manchester. The museum has been visited by upwards of 12,000 persons.

A meeting of the Victoria University Court was held at Manchester last week. Dr. Greenwood, the Vice-Chancellor, read a statement showing the progress of the University up to the present time. The number of matriculated students was stated approximately to be eighty, of whom eight have already passed the preliminary examinations, thirty-one are candidates for the preliminary examinations to be held in June, twenty-three are candidates for the ordinary degree of B.A. or B.Sc., and twenty-seven candidates for a degree with honours.

Lamson's father, the Rev. W. O. Lamson, has published a letter in the papers in which he endeavours to show that the plea of insanity in the case of his son is not a new one, nor was it first raised here after the trial, nor in America through any promptings from this side. It was urged at once when the case was developed by the prosecution, and the writer kept the opinion steadily before the legal advisers, only yielding at last to their judgment that the defence on other grounds, legal and scientific, could be maintained in such a way as to avert the fearful consequences of the alternative plea.

IRELAND.

Lord Carlingford was on Tuesday installed as Knight of St. Patrick, in the room of the late Lord Lurgan, at the Vice-regal Lodge, Dublin. The Lord Lieutenant, at the banquet which followed, alluded to the new Knight's past services in connection with Ireland, and expressed the determination of the Government to perform the duties before them in respect to that unhappy country undeterred by obloquy, nor disheartened by occasional failure. Lord Carlingford said the difficulties of Irish government were never so great as they are to-day; but there was no reason to despair, and the Government had resolved to do their best, and not to lose heart in the matter.

Mr. Parnell was on Monday released from Kilmainham Jail on parole. In consequence of the sudden death of a nephew in Paris, he requested permission to go there to attend his funeral, and this request was granted on condition that Mr. Parnell should not take part in any political demonstration. The female members of the Liverpool Land League have forwarded to Mr. Parnell a silver Easter egg containing one hundred sovereigns. The donors assure the author of the "No-Rent" manifesto that, "though incarcerated in a British prison," he still rules over the hearts of his countrymen.

At the Dublin Commission Court last Saturday, Matthew Kinsella, who had been found guilty of the manslaughter of Andrews, in Tighe-street, Dublin, was sentenced by Chief Justice Morris to be kept in penal servitude for twenty years. Two men in Dublin, named Martin and Edwin Fitzpatrick, have been sentenced to short terms of imprisonment for illegally possessing arms. John McClure and James Byrne, residents in Dublin, were on Saturday arrested under the Protection Act, and lodged in prison. In the kitchen of Byrne's house were found five rifles and five bayonets. Another attempt to murder a landlord has been made in Mayo, near Ballina. Mr. Dominic O'Donnell was fired at, and it appears that the bullet passed through his coat, but without injuring him. An attempt was made in North Kerry on Sunday to murder a farmer named Nolan, who, however, closed with his assailant and had a struggle, which ended in the scoundrel escaping. Further outrages are reported.

Mr. W. B. Smythe, of Killucan, whose sister-in-law was shot dead in his carriage on Sunday week, has written to Mr. Gladstone a letter, which the terrible ordeal through which he has passed can only slightly excuse, laying the guilt of the deed of blood at Mr. Gladstone's door in the face of the whole country. The Prime Minister, in reply, expresses his heartfelt sympathy with Mr. Smythe on the occasion of this terrible outrage, whilst declining to enter into the matters of charge contained in the communication. Six men have been arrested in connection with the murder of Mrs. Henry Smythe in Westmeath, and four of them have been remanded for eight days. Mr. Smythe has addressed a letter to his tenantry on the Barbarilla estate, in which he says:—"I do not go through the form of calling you friends. Few of you are, and most of you have assented to the deed of blood, and many of you only regret that one who has passed a long life and spent his income amongst you was not the victim. Some of you know what was intended, and are guilty in God's sight as the murderer." Mr. Smythe proceeds to inform his tenants that in future they will have to pay their rents to a non-resident agent, who would have no power to make allowances, nor do anything on the property not strictly required by law.

In the Dublin Gazette a reward of £2000 is offered for information leading to the conviction of the murderers of Mr. Herbert, and a reward of £500 for private information leading to the same result. A reward of £100 is also offered to any person who shall arrest and hand over to justice Denis Ryans and Patrick Lowrey, against whom true bills for the wilful murder of Patrick Sullivan at Marsh, West Cashery, in the county of Cork, were found at the last Cork Assizes, and who have since absconded; £50 is offered for such information as shall directly lead to the arrest of the two men; £100 reward is also offered for such information as shall lead to the arrest of the writer or printer of Boycotting notices which were found posted at Mullagh and Miltown Malbay, in the county of Clare, and £50 for such private information as shall lead to the same result; £200 reward is offered for the conviction of the person or persons who, on the night of the 27th ult., entered the house of Patrick Duggan, at Shroneamore, in the county of Kerry, and fired two shots, seriously wounding Patrick Duggan; for private information leading to the same result £100 is offered.

The Dowager Marchioness of Queensberry has addressed another letter to the people of Ireland, strongly denouncing the crimes arising out of the "No-rent" policy, and expressing her fear that the cause of self-government will be retarded in consequence; and Mr. P. J. Smyth has written a manly letter to his constituents, denouncing the conduct of the people in countenancing outrages.

THE MAGAZINES FOR APRIL.

SECOND NOTICE.

Mr. F. Harrison's essay upon our own century in the Fortnightly Review contains little that is not trite and obvious. As, nevertheless, obvious things are frequently in danger of being overlooked from their very visibility, it is well that such wholesome if ordinary truths as that the standard of civilisation is not the perfection of machinery should be occasionally enforced by the editor's vigorous rhetoric. M. Valentine Chirol calls attention to French intrigues in Syria; Mr. Alfred Aylward advocates the abandonment of South Africa, Capetown excepted; and Mr. Law, although portraying the social condition of the Russian empire in gloomy colours, considers that no revolution can occur at present, nihilism being almost confined to the numerically weak lower middle class. There are two literary articles of high merit. Mr. Morley gives the quintessence of Professor Bain's biography of James Mill, supplemented with excellent remarks of his own; and Mr. Andrew Lang deals sharply with M. Zola, whom he not unjustly regards as a literary speculator pandering to the taste of the vulgar while pretending to direct it.

The Contemporary Review has a large number of interesting contributions. "Egypt and Constitutional Rule" explains the peril in which the Egyptian fellah stands of being reduced to the miserable condition from which France and England delivered him under the "national administration" recently set up. Lady Verney continues her unfavourable delineations of French peasant proprietorship; Dr. Asa Gray suggests scepticism as to recent theories on the mutual relations of flowers and insects; M. de Laveleye describes the present condition of the struggle between Liberals and Clericals in Belgium; and Mr. Tuke powerfully enforces the inadequacy of every remedy for the distress of the poverty-stricken districts of Ireland except a comprehensive system of emigration.

The Atlantic Monthly has several very good papers, prominent among which are Professor Fiske's speculations upon the existence of the human race during the Miocene and Pleistocene epochs, and Mr. P. B. Marston's strictures upon what he considers the prosaic spirit of Mr. Morley's realistic idyl, "Dorothy." Mr. Marston's defence of poetic idealism is good and sound, but perhaps he does not sufficiently consider that in the kingdom of poets there are many mansions. After the continuation of "The Freres" the most remarkable contribution to Temple Bar is an analysis of Benjamin Constant's love letters to Madame Récamier—half passion, half posturing-making. Bret Harte, Mrs. Alexander, and the author of "Ready-Money Mortiboy," combine to make Belgravia attractive, with the co-operation of Mrs. Macquoid's notes on the abbey of York, and Dr. Wilson's discourse on cuttlefishes. The Gentleman's Magazine claims attention by Ouida's prognostication that vivisectionists will by-and-by be demanding human subjects for experiment, by Mr. Hule's argument that Chaucer was well acquainted with Woodstock, and by Mr. Justin H. McCarthy's summary of the Egyptian question. Mr. Proctor's theory of Jupiter and Saturn, Mr. Blind's "finds" in Shetlandic folk-lore, and Mr. Robinson's chapter on the cuckoo in poetry are also interesting and agreeable reading. The St. James's Magazine and London Society offer palatable light reading. The most important contribution to the Theatre is an account of Wagner's "Meistersinger," one of the two operas by him to be performed at Drury Lane in the approaching season.

The March number of the "Magazine of Art," published by Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin, contains illustrated articles on "Bells," by the Rev. H. R. Haweis; on "The Art of Savages," by Andrew Lang; on "The Decoration of the Home," by W. Cosmo Monkhouse; and on "Pictures of the Season." Amongst the numerous illustrations are full-page wood-engravings of the drawing by J. F. Millet, for the famous picture of "The Angelus," and of Jules Girardet's "Episode of the Siege of Saragossa," lately on view at the United Arts Gallery. The various periodicals issued by this firm include—The Life and Works of St. Paul, Picturesque Europe, the Family Magazine, Universal History, Gleanings from Popular Authors, Picturesque America, British Ballads, Old and New London, Old and New Edinburgh, Science for All, Familiar Wild Flowers, Royal Shakespeare, the Bible Educator, and of Cassell's Book of Sports and Pastimes.

"Art and Letters," under the conduct of Mr. J. Comyns-Carr, is improving. The engravings this month, including one from "The Marriage of Isaac and Rebecca," by Claud Lorraine, in the National Gallery, are very good, as is also the accompanying letterpress.

Among the Fashion Books are—Le Monde Elegant, Le Moniteur de la Mode, World of Fashion, Ladies' Gazette of Fashion, Le Follet, La Saison, Ladies' Treasury, Myra's Journal, Myra's Mid-Monthly, Weldon's Ladies' Journal and Household Journal, Young Ladies' Journal, and Dictionary of Needlework.

Other magazines and serial publications received are:—Time, St. James's, Churchman, Across Country, Aunt Judy's Magazine, Artists' Critical Record, Art and Letters, Men of Mark, Pathways of Palestine, St. Nicholas, Irish Monthly, Universal Instructor, Month, Home, Science Gossip, Argosy, Good Words, (containing illustrations of Quebec by Princess Louise, and a poem on the same subject by the Marquis of Lorne), Leisure Hour, Churchman's Shilling Magazine, Antiquary, Bibliographer, Burlington; and monthly parts of Chambers's Journal, All the Year Round, Household Words, Harper's Young People, English Mechanic and World of Science, Knowledge, Our Darlings, Sunday at Home, Sunday Magazine, Day of Rest, Boy's Own Paper, and Girl's Own Paper.

MR. TASSIE.

A catalogue from Messrs. Christie's, announcing a sale of intagli and cameos on the 20th inst., which has reached us, recalls a well-known name of a century ago—a name of European Art-celebrity, which, however, is to very many in the present day quite unfamiliar. James Tassie was born at Pollockshaws, near Glasgow, in 1735. Nothing is known of his ancestors; but the name savours more of Italy than of Scotland; and his Art-tastes were pre-eminently of the classic type. In 1751 Robert and Andrew Foulis, the celebrated printers, with great public spirit, founded an Academy of Fine Arts in Glasgow. Tassie became a student, and worked side by side with David Allan. Tassie's line was that of a modeller: his medallion portraits were of high reputation. His method was to take the portrait in wax; in the Life of Wedgwood (his contemporary), lately published, he is said to have required only two sittings. These were then cast in white enamel, a composition invented by Tassie and Dr. Quin, of Dublin, in which city Tassie had sought employment. In 1766 he settled in London, and proceeded to perfect his invention of taking impressions, or pastes, of antique and modern gems. Without introductions to the possessors of these treasures, the young artist had uphill work for some time, but by perseverance conquered. In 1775 his first catalogue appeared, a book now, doubtless, both choice and rare. Tassie's reputation now spread widely, and he gained access to the first cabinets in Europe. In 1791 his catalogue had grown into two volumes quarto, with many plates. In 1783 he was honoured by a commission from the Court of Russia for a complete set of his gems, cameos, and intagli, which he exhibited, it is believed, to the English Royal family. When he died, in 1799, at the age of sixty-four, his collection numbered nearly 20,000.

His nephew, William Tassie, succeeded him, and added largely to the collection, he himself being a very successful modeller, and employing the best of gem-engravers of the day—Marchant, Burch, and Charles and William Brown. These were not unworthy successors of Tyrgoteles, the famous Greek, and Dioscorides, the eminent Roman gem-engraver in the time of Augustus, whose portrait, executed by the latter, was specially esteemed. William Tassie supplemented the Russian Royal collection with his own choice additions; and, having made his fortune, retired into private life. Suddenly, a little before this, the Tassie taste, which was in its zenith at that time, subsided. Who shall say why? or explain the veerings of the weather-cock of fashion? The works, both cameos and intagli, remain, as ever, exquisitely beautiful. Possibly the demand for the delicate seals declined upon the coming in of adhesive envelopes; and yet it had been something to be able to send a beautiful work of art, in relief, in every letter to a friend. Thousands of these seals, which used to sell for never less than three shillings each, are to be sold in lots at the coming auction at Messrs. Christie's. Then it appears that a principal workman played W. Tassie false and undersold him, and probably, by cheap, inferior work, brought down the good name of the "Tassies." However this may be, the taste (as Tassie predicted it would) has revived, and "Tassies" are, by many collectors, prized even above "Wedgwoods," of which there are some choice specimens in this sale. For Tassie and Wedgwood used to interchange. W. Tassie left a complete collection of his gems to the National Gallery of Scotland, where they are shown in the "Tassie" room. The remainder passed into the possession of his nephew, by whose will this fine collection is finally to be dispersed.

YORKSHIRE FINE ART SOCIETY, LEEDS.

SUMMER EXHIBITION OPENS MAY 29, 1892, consisting of the works of living Artists (for sale) and other works of Art presented to the Society. Last day for receiving Pictures, May 11. Artists desiring to exhibit are requested to apply to JOHN BARBER, FREDERICK SPARE, Hon. Secs.

ORPHAN GIRLS who have lost both parents, descended from respectable parentage, are received between the ages of six and eleven, from any part of the United Kingdom, into the HOME FOR POOR ORPHANS, Grove-road, St. John's-wood. They are clothed, boarded, and educated free of all expense, and, on their leaving, at the age of sixteen to seventeen, are, if possible, provided with situations, or are delivered to their friends. The next election will take place in July, and candidates may now be nominated. Those early on the list are usually the successful ones. An annual subscription of one guinea or more constitutes a governor, and confers the privilege of two votes at each election for every guinea subscribed. A donation of five guineas or more constitutes a life governor, and gives one vote at each election for each five guineas. FUNDS will be very thankfully received. Forms of nomination and all particulars may be obtained on application, by letter, to the Hon. Secretary, at the Home.

FOR BREAKFAST.

EPPE'S COCOA. By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operation of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Eppe has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame. Civil Service Gazette. Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold only in packets, labelled, JAMES EPPE and CO., HOMOEOPATHIC CHEMISTS.

FOR AFTERNOON USE.

EPPE'S CHOCOLATE ESSENCE. If cocoa seeds as imported are roasted, then broken up into "nibs"—small pieces—and subjected to very high pressure in an hydraulic press, they give out a large percentage of their oil or butter, which is removed, and the remaining constituents of the nibs fall into a powder—Chocolate Essence. This chocolate essence is left unwatered. It possesses an alike enlivening principle or alkaloid to that contained in tea or coffee. Boiled for a few minutes, it affords a beverage of a coffee-like consistence. Unaffected by climate. Each packet (4d. or 6d.) or tin (6d., 1s. 4d., 2s. 4d., 5s., or 7s. 6d.) is labelled "James Eppe and Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, 46, Threadneedle-street; and 170, Piccadilly."

EPPE'S ESSENCE SKILLET.—A pot for boiling Eppe's Chocolate Essence, and which needs no watching, its specialty being that the contained liquid cannot boil over. Half-Pint size, 1s.; Pint, 1s. 3d.; Two Pints, 1s. 6d.

THE VOLUNTEER REVIEW AT PORTSMOUTH: THE GUN-BOATS MEDINA, MEDWAY, ANT, AND SPEEDY OPENING FIRE ON THE ENEMY.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

THE EASTER VOLUNTEER REVIEW.

The annual Field-Day of the Metropolitan and Home Counties Volunteer Forces on Easter Monday took place at Portsmouth with complete success, according to the programme of the War Office, which was published last week. We then gave a series of illustrations, with a descriptive account, of the town and neighbourhood of Portsmouth and Southsea; of the Hilsa Lines, the heights of Portsdown, Forts Widley, Southwick, and Purbrook; the village of Cosham, between Havant and Portsmouth, on the route of the attacking force from the eastward; and Porchester, on the western side of the harbour, by which the defending force came from Fareham to meet its supposed invading enemy. These localities will be found in the Sketch Map accompanying our present illustrations and narrative of the manœuvres actually performed last Monday, which will readily be understood from the simplest statement of their "general idea." It was supposed that an enemy had landed on the Sussex coast east of Portsmouth, and had sent an attacking force to Havant, with a view to besiege Portsmouth from the land side, which is defended by Hilsa Lines. To encounter this attacking force, and to relieve the Portsmouth garrison, a division of the Aldershot forces had been sent to Fareham, which lies at the western extremity of the Portsdown range, Havant being at the eastern, while Portsea island, with the harbour and town of Portsmouth, is situated to the southward both of Fareham and of Havant, about midway between them, south-east of the former, south-west of the latter place. The Portsdown hills extend from west to east, and their line of forts—named Wallington, Nelson, Southwick, Widley, Purbrook, and Farlington—command to the southward the whole route, through Cosham and Porchester, by which the attacking force would attempt to advance westward, having also the Hilsa batteries on its left flank.

The names of the commanding officers, with their staffs, and of those commanding divisions and brigades, were published in our last week's paper. Major-General G. W. A. Higginson, C.B., commanded the attacking force, his Generals of Division being Major-General E. Newdigate, C.B., and Major-General Sir Evelyn Wood, K.C.B. The defending force was commanded by Major-General T. E. Pakenham, who had but one division of Volunteers, under Major-General the Hon. E. T. Gage, C.B., besides some of the regular troops.

The commander of the attacking force, General Higginson, had about 15,000 men at his disposal. Of artillery he had 1050 men, eight 40-pounder breechloaders, and twelve 20-pounders, worked by the 1st Sussex and the 3rd Middlesex Artillery, the latter under command of Colonel Lord Truro. In General Newdigate's Division the 1st Brigade, under command of Colonel H. Kerr, numbered about 2500; the 2nd Brigade, led by Colonel the Hon. C. J. Addington, just 2000; and the 3rd Brigade, under Colonel T. Lloyd, a little over 2200 infantry volunteers. In addition to these there was a Divisional Battalion numbering something over 500 (a field battery of Royal Artillery armed with 16-pounders, capable of rapid movement from point to point), and a mere handful of Hampshire Yeomanry to act as scouts. Sir Evelyn Wood's division consisted also of three brigades of somewhat similar strength. The first, commanded by Colonel Viscount Bury, was about 2300 strong; the second, under Lord Ranelagh, nominally 2340; and the third, of which Colonel J. Sprot was Brigadier, numbering about 1500, in addition to the divisional battalion composed of the Artists (20th Middlesex), over 550 strong, and a small detachment of the Cambridge University Corps.

General Pakenham had under his command, for the defending force, a total of Volunteers, 9729, consisting of 3rd Kent Artillery, with eight guns, 4th (West London) Middlesex, 14th (Inns of Court) Middlesex, 12th (Civil Service) Middlesex, 1st, 2nd, and 3rd London, which formed the First Brigade, under Colonel E. H. Clive, Grenadier Guards; 2nd Middlesex, 7th Middlesex (London Scottish), 10th Middlesex, 13th Middlesex (Queen's Westminster), 1st and 2nd Tower Hamlets, forming a brigade under Colonel G. Moncrieff, Scots Guards; and a third brigade, under Colonel G. T. Gough, composed of the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Hampshire, 1st Isle of Wight, and 1st Wilts; with a divisional battalion of the 21st Middlesex (Finsbury). The regular troops with this defending force included those occupying Hilsa Lines—namely, a detachment of the Royal Artillery, with eight 64-pounder guns, 779 of the Royal Marine Artillery, a battalion of the Leicestershire regiment, and one of the Gordon Highlanders, with a troop of Hampshire Yeomanry Cavalry; and those holding the position of Fareham, which were a battalion of the Berkshire regiment, one of Royal Highlanders, and one of Royal Marine Light Infantry. The defence was also supported by the fire of the gun-boats, Medina, Medway, Ant, and Speedy, in the adjacent harbour.

As twelve o'clock drew near there was a general movement among the attacking force. Its plan of operations was now unfolded. General Newdigate was intrusted with the right of the line. His extreme right rested on the road past Little Park wood; his centre brigade was on the down land, his left more advanced towards Purbrook, where his communication with General Wood was to be maintained by the Artists Corps. Wood's Divisional Battalion and Newdigate were to advance in echelon of Brigades from the inner or left flank, the configuration of the ground necessitating this. The orders were as far as possible to keep off cultivated fields, and this would oblige Newdigate to pass along the northern slopes of Portsdown. He was, however, to open out to a wider point as soon as he could, probably on reaching Purbrook Park and the main road. There he was to push forward without delay, and fight all he found in front of him, driving back the enemy if he could; then wheeling round to his left, join hands with Wood, and assault Portsdown Ridge.

The left advance was Sir Evelyn Wood's task. Some distance in his front, and down below the Portsdown Ridge, was the village of Cosham, a place within easier reach of Hilsa and its garrison than of the attacking troops. To advance along Portsdown with the enemy in force at Cosham would have been to expose the left flank to the utmost danger. At the same time, Cosham was within range of the big guns at the Hilsa Lines—of a calibre sufficient to annihilate an enemy who ventured to occupy Cosham. The original instructions laid it down that the Attacking Force should actually seize and hold this village; but General Higginson and Sir Evelyn Wood, for the reasons just stated, set these orders aside. All that General Wood decided to do was to make a determined demonstration against Cosham, and, leaving a strong force to mask it, go on his way along the northern slope of the ridge. His subsequent movements were to depend in a great measure upon the advance of the First Division and what success attended it. At five minutes to twelve General Wood held his Division close up to Purbrook Fort. Lord Bury's Brigade was on the right, Lord Ranelagh's in the centre and rather to the rear, and, as a support, Colonel Sprot's was on the left, adjoining the main road. The latter were all Surrey battalions, men in dark green uniforms, looking all of them exceedingly smart and full of work. On them devolved the honour of opening the action. A couple of minutes before the gun fired, one company was detached from the leading battalion, and extended in skirmishing order below and behind the crest of the village. These capital light troops at once lay down and proceeded to crawl over the hill. They were just on the summit as the clock struck and the puff of the signal-gun was seen on the left of Hilsa, followed by the report. The next second they were over, and running down at a smart double, to gain the shelter of the hedges. As they pushed on towards Cosham, almost at the same moment another line of skirmishers appeared in front of Purbrook Fort, and continued the line of attack.

Just then the Prince of Wales, in the uniform of the Civil Service Rifles, of which he is Honorary Colonel, cantered up towards Purbrook, accompanied by Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, and followed by Equerries, Staff, and an escort of Hussars, among the Staff being the French Military Attaché in the well-known blue and black of the Chasseurs d'Afrique. Of course, a crowd followed his Royal Highness, heartily cheering him. Crowd and noise notwithstanding, Sprot's Brigade pressed on, and Wood's artillery—the cannons opening roar—soon drowned every other sound. The guns of the 1st Sussex Artillery, posted just off the high road in a field, began to fire upon the pontoon-bridge which had been thrown across the wet ditch of the Hilsa Lines. Wood's obvious wish was to break down this bridge, and so prevent any sortie from the Lines. Even before the fire commenced, the enemy's skirmishers must have entered the village. Their presence there was soon indicated by the crack of their rifles as they interchanged shots in quick succession with the advanced skirmishers from Sprot's Brigade. Hilsa Lines were still silent. The gunners were no doubt waiting till Wood's attack was more fully developed, and for this quite another half hour was allowed to elapse. Meanwhile the heads of Newdigate's Columns had made their way as far as the high road, covered by their divisional battalion and the Artists. In between the Artists and Sprot's Brigade came Lord Bury's and Lord Ranelagh's Brigades, while the 3rd Middlesex Artillery, sixteen guns in all, four of them 40-pounders, were pushed well on past the gorge of the main road, and presently came into action, their left against the Hilsa Lines.

It was half-past twelve, and now the batteries on Hilsa began to fire. The gun-boats near Porchester, at the head of Portsmouth Harbour, also joined in the fight. A sharp Artillery duel ensued between Wood's guns on the ridge and those of the defenders below—a fight in which Wood was considerably overmatched. It was under cover of this fire that Sprot was meant to continue his demonstration against Cosham, moving down by a cross road into a hollow way, where he would have been more or less unobserved. Instead of this his battalions all filed along the main road, till past the gorge and Spark's Tea Gardens, when they showed front to their left, and lined the ridge behind them. The 3rd Middlesex blazed away, serving their guns with great precision. Other guns soon came into play—those of the Field Battery, which Newdigate kept constantly moving forward, and always well to the front.

The fight now was nearing Fort Widley, upon the ramparts of which the spectators from Portsmouth had collected. Newdigate had continued to advance without a halt. Already his advanced lines were hotly engaged with the enemy, who began to show in force on a line parallel to his advance; while high upon the ridge, at a point to the front of Southwick, his heavy artillery began a sharp, well-sustained fire. As Newdigate's attack became more and more developed, the enemy gathered strength to oppose him. Now the din became deafening. Besides the roar of the heavy guns there was the incessant sharp rattle of musketry fire. Newdigate now attempted an extension of his right, with the idea of outflanking the enemy. His field battery came into action at a corner near Widley church, and two of his battalions, following a road on his right, were soon seen among the woods about Comp House and Hook Heath Farm. All this time he was exposed to a tremendous fire from the guns on the Ridge. Although his right was now considerably in advance, the line was unbroken with the centres left. In the centre was Addington's Brigade, and next Lord Ranelagh's, moving forward to take its share of the fighting, Lord Bury's being on the left and close under Widley Fort. With these supports to hold the enemy to his left, Newdigate's next move was to pivot on Comp House, swinging round his right shoulder, so as to make both a front and flanking attack. The enemy were not unprepared for this, and to meet it occupied New Barn, a farm-house in their front, the possession of which they were determined to contest sharply. But a diversion occurred at this moment on the other flank, and a musketry fire was heard in the direction of Cosham. Evidently Sprot's Brigade were being hard pressed, and from a quarter which was safe enough except as regards long-range artillery fire. The Hilsa garrison had, however, stolen a march upon the attacking force, and had gained Cosham in considerable force quite unobserved. This had been accomplished by removing the pontoon bridge opposite the sally port and retaining one raft. On this detachment after detachment of Gordon Highlanders, and of the Leicestershire Regiment, were ferried over, and in small parties moved up to the village and beyond it. A vigorous volley from this new line of skirmishers first gave the alarm. Sprot had to deploy hastily nearly all his strength to meet this sudden onslaught, and with difficulty held his own. The fire between defenders and attacking force on this side was warm and continuous, and it was still in progress when General Higginson gathered up all his forces for a supreme effort. The guns of the 3rd Middlesex, having done their work in covering Sprot, had advanced to the glacis of Fort Widley, and made known their presence immediately by opening fire. Under cover of this Lord Bury went on against the Pigeon-house Farm. General Newdigate, leaving a sufficient force to check the enemy, who were in considerable strength on his right, continued his advance. Lord Ranelagh, in the centre, also went forward. The fight was waged hotly. The musketry firing grew more and more furious, the field battery joining in well. The enemy clearly wavered. They were outnumbered and over-matched; their lines fell slowly back, and the struggle was approaching its conclusion. The fire presently slackened—a sure sign that the ammunition was nearly expended, and it was just two o'clock when the Umpires intervened, and gave the victory to the Attacking side. The troops lay down for rest and refreshment.

The troops were so scattered that a long time elapsed before the men, who had gone through such active operations, could be formed up for the march-past. This took place on the slope adjoining Fort Southwick, the saluting-point being about half-way up the hill; here, when the signal was given for the 22,000 Volunteers who had taken part in the contest to be set in motion, his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, and the Commander-in-Chief were surrounded by the head-quarter staff, Princess Mary Adelaide and the Duke of Teck, and a large number of foreign officers. The hill was literally covered with spectators, who looked on with admiration at the ranks of the Volunteer army passed in review. Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, who has now had the honour of commanding on the occasion of three Easter Monday Reviews, rode at the head of the largest number of volunteers that has ever taken part in these field-days. The divisions were formed up in line of quarter column facing east. First came General Pakenham leading his three brigades of volunteers, consisting in all of 9729 men. The gunners of the 3rd Kent came in for great applause, and most of the metropolitan corps were also loudly cheered. As the men marched by, they were guided off the ground by a staff officer towards their railway stations. Following the third division came the first and second, those of Generals Newdigate and Sir Evelyn Wood; consisting of the brigades of Colonel Kent, Colonel the Hon. C. J. Addington, Colonel T. F. Lloyd, Lords Bury and Ranelagh, and Colonel Sprot, and the artillery, under Colonel Bayley, R.A., composed of the 1st Sussex and the 3rd Middlesex. The total number of men in these two divisions amounted to 15,085. It was not until half-past five that the review was concluded, and his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, together with the Staff, left the ground. Previous to doing so, he joined the Commander-in-Chief, and expressed to some of the General officers in command his entire satisfaction with the proceedings of the day. The following General Order was issued by his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief:—

"Portsmouth, April 10, 1881.

"It is very gratifying to the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief, upon each fresh occasion when his Royal Highness has an opportunity of reviewing large bodies of Volunteers, to witness on the part of all ranks a greater steadiness under arms, and an increased attention to drill. Upwards of 20,000 Volunteers took part in to-day's operations, and the manner in which these were carried out reflects great credit upon all concerned. The soldier-like bearing of the men, their prompt obedience to their officers, and the silence with which the movements were effected were most satisfactory. The good conduct of the Volunteers on their march from Petersfield, and of those who for the last two days have been quartered in and around Portsmouth, does honour to the great national force to which they belong. It has afforded Field Marshal his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales great pleasure to take part as a Colonel of Volunteers in to-day's proceedings. The Field Marshal Commander-in-Chief begs to thank General his Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar for the excellence of his arrangements, which conducted so much to the success of these operations; and his Royal Highness congratulates the General Officers, the Brigadiers, the Staff, and all the officers of the regular forces who have given their assistance, upon the efficiency with which they performed their respective duties.

"Signed, G. J. WOLSELEY, A.G."

After the review, on Monday afternoon, the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Cambridge, and Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, with their staffs, embarked in steam pinnaces at Paul's Grove, and proceeded down the harbour. On landing, the Prince, the Duke of Cambridge, and Prince Edward paid a visit to the Soldiers' Institute. In the evening, Prince Edward gave a dinner, at which the chief military and naval officers of the garrison and port, with the Mayor of Portsmouth (Alderman J. G. Whitcombe), who has displayed great energy and public spirit in connection with the local arrangements for the Review, had the honour of meeting his Royal Highness. The evening's entertainment was closed with the "German Tattoo" of the collective garrison military bands, and with a torchlight procession of fifty torchbearers from each regiment of the garrison, specially arranged by Prince Edward for this occasion. They marched through the streets, appeared before Government House, and performed there half an hour, with a tremendous noise of drums, fifes, and bassoons, and the glare of two hundred petroleum torches, in honour of the Prince of Wales. There was also a grand display of fireworks on the Parade, and a general street illumination.

ROYAL NATIONAL LIFE-BOAT INSTITUTION.

At a meeting of this institution, held on the 6th inst. at its house, John-street, Adelphi, the silver medal of the institution was voted to Mr. Richard Headon, coxswain of its Clovelly life-boat, in acknowledgment of his long and gallant services in that boat in saving life from shipwrecks. Rewards amounting to £280 were likewise granted to the crews of life-boats for services rendered during the storms of the past month, in which period they had been instrumental in saving one hundred and twenty-three lives from wrecks, besides helping to rescue three vessels from destruction. Rewards were also granted to the crews of shore-boats for saving life from wrecks on our coasts; and payments amounting to £4720 were made on different life-boat establishments.

The receipt of various contributions and legacies was announced at the meeting, including £1065 from George Middlewood, Esq., of Rufforth Hall, for a life-boat in memory of his late son, who was lost at sea, the boat being named the Matthew Middlewood; £200 from G. Buckstone Brown, Esq., of Halifax; £100 from the Misses Hewitt; and £52 10s. from the stewards of the Covent Garden Life-Boat Fund, in aid of the support of their life-boat. The late Mr. C. R. Brown, of Mile-end, had left the institution £1000; Mr. James Murphy, Newry, £1000; Mr. John Hartnell, Blomfield-street, £100; and Mr. J. C. Cowley, Kilsby, £10.

The committee expressed their deep regret at the death of Lord Robartes, who was a vice-president of the institution, and who had always been a liberal contributor to its funds.

Reports were read from the chief inspector and the five district inspectors on their recent visits to life-boat stations.

A large number of the Berks Volunteers marched on Monday morning to Bearwood, the seat of Mr. J. Walter, M.P., where there was a sham fight, which was witnessed by a large number of persons.

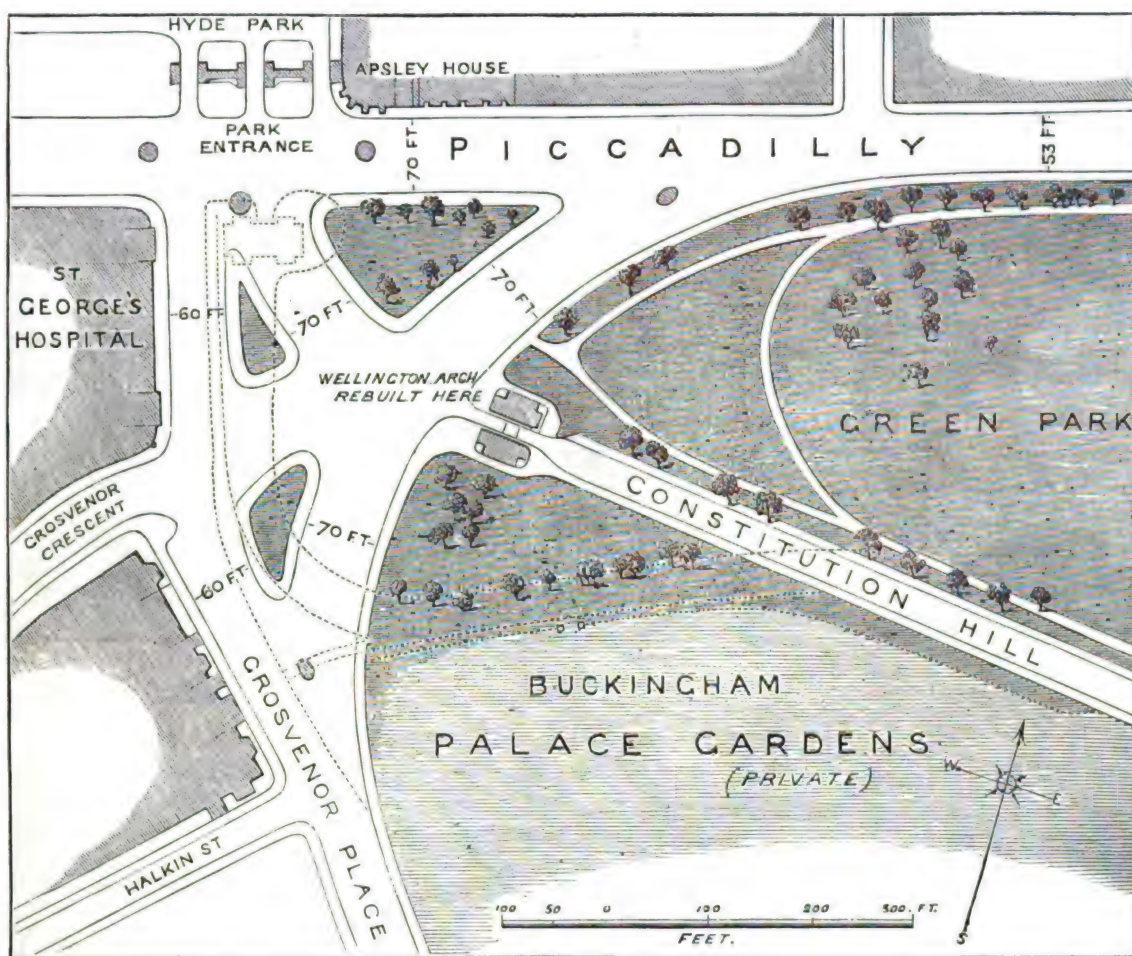

The troops at Aldershot, with the 11th Middlesex Rifle Volunteers, under Lieutenant-Colonel Gore-Browne, went through an interesting sham fight in the vicinity of the Camp, on Tuesday.

Three bodies of Artillery Volunteers spent Easter Monday in practice firing at the mouth of the river. The 2nd Kent occupied Garrison Point Fort, Sheerness; the 1st London manned the guns on the Curtain Battery, Sheerness; and the 1st Surrey were located in the Isle of Grain Fort.

An account has been published of the gross amount of all annuities, for terms of years transferred, and of all sums of money paid to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, as well as of the gross amount of annuities for lives, and for terms of lives, which have been granted for the same, and contracts for payments at death which have been made within the year ending Jan 5 last. The total stock transferred and paid to the Commissioners amounted to £205,668, and the money paid, including commissions, was £701,018. The immediate annuities granted, and the contracts for payments at death made, amounted to £78,397, and the deferred to £1807. The contracts for payments at death came to £23,715.

PROPOSED IMPROVEMENT AT HYDE PARK CORNER.

The Plan here presented to view will at once explain the proposal of the First Commissioner of Crown Works and Buildings for the improvement of the corner of the Green Park, in Piccadilly, at the top of Constitution Hill, opposite Hyde Park Corner, including the removal of the arch surmounted by the equestrian statue of the Duke of Wellington. It will be seen that Mr. Shaw Lefevre's scheme is to cut off a portion from the Green Park, not so considerable as to amount to any spoliation of the park, but sufficient to allow of a road extending with a gentle sweep, rounding off the north-west angle of the park from opposite Hamilton-place to the point opposite Halkin-street. This will lay open a nearly triangular space opposite Hyde Park-gate and Apsley House and the adjoining houses. This space is to be laid out in inclosed flower-gardens, leaving between them and the Green Park the road already mentioned, by which the connection between Park-lane and Piccadilly and the Grosvenor-place district will be maintained without the necessity of going up to Hyde Park Corner; the line of road straight from Grosvenor-place to the Park entrance will be maintained, but widened; the sharp curve at the top of Constitution-hill will disappear, this part of it being thrown into the proposed place, and the line from the straight portion of Constitution-hill will be carried up in an easier sweep between the parterres, to meet the straight road opposite Hyde Park Gate. The Wellington Arch is proposed to be taken down and rebuilt at the top of the straight line of Constitution-hill, standing at about an angle of 45 deg. with the present position of the arch.

PLAN OF THE PROJECTED IMPROVEMENT AT HYDE PARK CORNER.

ments was the reproduction of quality of tone by sympathetic vibration, in which eight tuning-forks, with their overtones, excited the tones in the corresponding forks. With some other very remarkable examples of the beats produced by dissonance this very successful course of lectures was concluded.

RESEMBLANCES OF SOUND, LIGHT, AND HEAT.

Professor Tyndall gave his third and concluding lecture on Thursday, March 30. He began by referring to Dr. Young's studies of the nature of sound, as antecedent to those on light, and illustrated, by means of tuning-forks, the phenomena of concord and dissonance; the reflection of sound was well exhibited. A board was so placed on two stools that reflection of sound from it augmented the agitation of a sensitive flame; the flame was still when flannel was thrown on the board; by moving the board variations in the flame were produced. These facts were applied in explanation of intervals of silence observed by General Duane in the sound signals from the American coasts to ships at sea. The Professor then referred to Newton's rings, as illustrative of a similar periodicity as regards light. After projecting on the screen these beautiful phenomena with a thick lens, two red and blue glasses edge to edge, he showed, by rapidly moving them to and fro, that the rings as rapidly changed their diameters. He then commented on and illustrated the differing opinions of Newton and Young respecting the wave theory, as applied in explanation of these facts. Professor Tyndall next described the discovery of the polarisation of light by Malus in 1808, and the difficulties it presented to the reception of the undulatory theory, and then explained how these difficulties were removed by the hypothesis that the waves of light are transversal to the line of propagation, and not longitudinal, like those of sound. Fine illustrations of this polarisation were given by means of Iceland spar and tourmalines. The lecture concluded with experimental illustrations of the resemblances of radiant heat to light and sound. The Professor stated that the heat of the invisible rays of the spectrum is eight times greater than that of the visible rays, that these rays can be converged to a focus by a lens, and that they can be rendered visible by being made to impinge on platinum, and can also be polarised. There is, therefore, no doubt that light and radiant heat are produced in the same way.

ELECTRIC DISCHARGE IN A MAGNETIC FIELD.

Mr. W. Spottiswoode, D.C.L., President R.S., at the evening meeting on Friday, March 31, described and illustrated some of the results of a series of experiments made by Mr. J. F. Moulton, and himself. In the first place, he described their special method

ROYAL INSTITUTION LECTURES.

MECHANISM OF HEARING.

Professor McKendrick, in his eleventh and concluding lecture, given on Tuesday, March 28, began by describing minutely, with the aid of casts, models, and diagrams, the structure of the internal ear, more especially of the cochlea. After indicating the views held by many of the older physiologists, that the cochlea contained some kind of apparatus for the perception of pitch of tune, he described the researches of Corti and the theories as to hearing founded on these observations by Helmholtz and others. He then pointed out the difficulties in accepting the view that the arches of Corti were the vibrating bodies. They are too stiff and rigid to vibrate; and, consequently, physiologists have more recently adopted the view that the membrane on which the rods are situated may be conceived to be composed of segments, each of which may vibrate to a special tone, according to its length and tension. But the nerves do not end either in the membrane or in the rods; they end in the hair-cells, situated on the back of the arches. It is therefore difficult to come to the conclusion that there are any bodies capable of vibrating in the organ of Corti, except the hairs attached to the cells; whilst, if these are the vibrating bodies, we have no apparent mechanism in the ear to account for the phenomena of pitch and quality. The Professor suggested that vibrations of sound may possibly act in the terminal organs of hearing by inducing some kind of molecular change, and not actual vibrations, like that in a resounding body; whilst the ultimate analysis of tones may occur, not in the ear, but in the brain. He then illustrated the production of "beats," and showed their application in theories of concord and dissonance. Amongst other experi-group as corresponding to clays. When the chemical compositions of the rocks are compared, sand and clays are found to include the same elements in the same proportions, and therefore the differences in the mineral composition of igneous rocks, as in the presence or absence of oligoclase, are often determined by the growth and decay of seaweeds on a sea-bed. Hence the ancient lavas have the same composition as the most recent, except when altered by decomposition; and, since the heating of rocks was due to compression, which produced upheaval, and the access of water was due to fracture that followed from compression, the materials which are ejected in eruptions are naturally such as were forced into the upward folds, and the sequence in time was determined by the order of their superposition.

The following are the lecture arrangements after Easter:—

Mr. E. B. Tylor, four lectures, on the "History of Customs and Beliefs," on Tuesdays, April 18 to May 9.

Professor A. Gangee, four lectures, on "Digestion," on Tuesdays, May 16 to June 6.

Professor Dewar, eight lectures, on the "Chemical and Physical Properties of the Metals," on Thursdays, April 20 to June 8.

Mr. F. Pollock, four lectures, on the "History of the Science of Politics," on Saturdays, April 22 to May 13.

Professor D. Masson, on "Poetry and its Literary Forms," on Saturdays, May 20 to June 10.

Probable arrangements for the Friday evening meetings after Easter:—April 21, Professor Dewar, Experimental Researches of Henri Ste. Claire Deville, Hon. M.R.I.; April 28, Professor Abel, Some Dangerous Properties of Dusts; May 5, Professor R. Grant, The Proper Motions of the Stars; May 12, A. G. Vernon Harcourt, Esq., The Relative Value of Different Modes of Lighting; May 19, Sir Frederick Bramwell; May 26, Sir Henry S. Maine, Sacred Laws of the Hindus; June 2, H. H. Statham, Esq., The Intellectual Basis of Music; June 9, Professor Burdon Sanderson, The Excitability of Plants.

MUSIC.

Easter brings the usual comparative and transient lull in musical activity, which will soon be resumed with increased energy. We are, indeed, on the verge of a season of unexampled pressure as to the quantity of attractions to be compressed into a period of some two or three months. The Crystal Palace Saturday Afternoon Concerts were intermitted for a week, and, accordingly, will be resumed, with the eighteenth performance, this week.

We have already recorded the close of the twenty-fourth season of the Monday Popular Concerts and the Saturday afternoon performances associated with them, the other specialties of last week having been the sacred concerts given on Good Friday at the Royal Albert Hall, St. James's Hall, the Crystal Palace, and the Alexandra Palace. The first derived extra importance from the fine singing of Madame Albani in "The Messiah," which produced a deep impression in the several recitative passages; in the solo, "Come unto me," especially in the bright air, "Rejoice greatly;" and, above all, in the pathetic "I know that my Redeemer liveth." The effect on the multitudinous audience was of a marked description. The other solos were efficiently rendered by Madame Enriquez, Mr. Maas, and Mr. B. Foote (in lieu of Signor Foli). The choruses were grandly sung, especially "For unto us" and the "Hallelujah." Some omissions were made in order that the performance might conclude at a comparatively early hour. Mr. Barnby conducted, and Dr. Stainer presided at the organ. At St. James's Hall the programme included a performance of Rossini's "Stabat Mater," and a varied selection of music of a religious character, with the co-operation of a band and chorus of about 300 performers. Concerts of sacred music, sustained by eminent artists, were also given at the Crystal Palace and the Alexandra Palace.

The next specialty will be the opening of the Royal Italian Opera season, on Tuesday evening. We have already given an outline of the arrangements for the forthcoming performances.

The Musical Union will open its thirty-eighth season next Tuesday afternoon, under the directorship of M. Lasserre, who replaced Mr. John Ella (the founder of the institution) on his recent retirement.

The ensuing month will witness the inauguration of two great schemes of German opera performances, one beginning, at Her Majesty's Theatre, on May 5; the other at Drury-lane Theatre, on May 18. The first of these enterprises will be devoted to performances and repetitions—in the original German text, by German artists—of Wagner's series of four Nibelungen "opera-dramas;" the other venture being devoted to representations—also by German artists—of some of Wagner's earlier stage works, and of operas by classical composers. Of the details of these schemes we shall take an early opportunity of speaking more specifically.

The competition for the Sterndale Bennett scholarship took place at the Royal Academy of Music last week. There were seven candidates, and the scholarship was awarded to George William F. Crowther. In the competition for the Parepa-Rosa scholarship there were forty-one candidates, and the scholarship was awarded to Kate Winifred Payne.

The Princess of Wales has accepted the dedication of Herr Gade's new cantata, "Psyche" (to be produced at the approaching Birmingham Festival), in which Madame Marie Roze is to sustain the principal part.

A meeting of the City Committee recently appointed to aid the establishment of a Royal College of Music was held last week at the Mansion House. The Lord Mayor presided. The fund now amounts to £58,616. Mr. Samuel Morley, M.P., in moving the appointment of an Executive Committee, said it was hoped that, with the aid of the companies, a sum of £50,000 in all would be raised in the City. Alderman Sir Robert Carden, M.P., seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously. The Court of Aldermen have subscribed among themselves nearly £700.

Mlle. Sarah Bernhardt was married last week at St. Andrew's Church, Wells-street, to M. Damala, a Greek gentleman, who some time since replaced M. Angelo in the company with which the celebrated actress has made her Continental tour. M. Damala, who was originally in the diplomatic service, has been known, since he joined the stage, as M. Daria. He is thirty-five years of age. The bride travelled all the way from Naples to be married in England. On the previous Friday she appeared in "La Dame aux Camélias," and she left the Neapolitan capital the following morning, as was generally supposed, for Nice. As a matter of fact, however, Mlle. Bernhardt, accompanied by M. Damala, journeyed direct to Paris, and being there joined by Mr. Mayer, who was one of the few witnesses of the rite, travelled express to London, via Boulogne and Folkestone. The newly-married pair returned immediately to the Continent, intending to go direct to Barcelona. The marriage will in no way interfere with Madame Damala's theatrical career.

PRODUCTS OF VOLCANIC ACTIVITY.

Professor H. G. Seeley gave his third and concluding lecture on Saturday, the 1st inst. He began by stating that in texture and chemical composition lavas are comparable with slags, which are but the constituents of water-formed rocks melted up. The lavas, though originally grouped by Bunsen into acidic and basic, are practically classified by the percentage of silica they contain. Hence the division of lavas have been framed into rhyolites, trachytes, and dolerites; but when the chemical composition of these rocks is compared, on the one hand, with the gradation of texture, by which a sand on the coast passes through a clay into other rocks, and, on the other hand, with the observed transition from sand and clay through metamorphic rocks into the crystalline axes of mountain chains, the conclusion is enforced that there is no a priori improbability in regarding the acid group of igneous rocks as corresponding to sandstones, and the basic
